Amendment offered by Mr. MEAD: Page 57, line 7, after the word "substitutes", strike out "$195,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "$197,250,000."

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, in explanation of this amendment may I say to the Members the current appropriation for clerks is $186,900,000. The Budget approved an item of $195,000,000 for 1938, which figure has been reported by the committee. Here is an instance in which the committee and the Budget are in harmony, but this amount allows only enough money to permit the appointment of about 1,000 additional clerks for the entire Postal Service of the United States. At least 2,500 additional clerks are needed, rather than 1,000.

Boston, Chicago, Philadelphia, Los Angeles, and one or two other cities have already requested as many clerks as will be permitted under this appropriation, and if their requests are granted the mail volume in all the other post offices in the country will have to be handled as best it can by the present personnel.

Not only should we take into consideration the tremendous increase in mail volume, running into billions of pieces, but we should likewise consider the reduction in personnel that has taken place in the last 6 or 7 years.

Under the administration of former Postmaster General Brown the Service was overmanned, due to the large drop in mail volume from 1929 to 1933. At that time the chairman of the Appropriations Committee and the Postmaster General urged that an appropriation be approved which would man the service adequately to expedite the delivery of the mail The Postmaster General at one of the hearings before the Appropriations Committee boldly told the chairman of that committee that the Postal Service was overmanned, yet the Appropriations Committee allowed that appropriation.

In the last year or two of the administration of Postmaster General Brown the personnel was reduced by over 8,000. Under the present Postmaster General and in the early days of his administration a further reduction of over 10,000 was made in the Service. That is a total reduction of 18,000 in personnel. But with the volume of mail increasing rapidly, and a further increase prophesied for the coming year, with the post offices in many of the large cities of the United States inadequately manned, with no surplus personnel, as was the case a few years ago, the Post Office Department cannot secure from the Appropriations Committee a sufficient appropriation to man the post offices of the country adequately.

Mr. Chairman, I am not here asking you to appropriate money in a manner that would be unwise and imprudent, but I do want to call attention to these facts.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I am merely pleading for an efficient service to increase and intensify the Nation's drive for economic recovery. I want to encourage rather than harass business in its effort to reemploy the unemployed of our country. I want the Members of the House to realize that the Post Office Committee in the last few years has recommended many savings that are reflected in the present appropriation bill. It was the Post Office Committees of the House and Senate that revised the air-mail law which resulted in a saving of $8,000,000. It was our committee that initiated a bill reclassifying the salaries of rural letter carriers and resulting in a saving of two to three million dollars.

Under an authorization which had the support of our committee the Department may purchase and construct substations and garages, which resulted in large and substantial savings. By a revision of special mail rates we have increased the revenues of the Department. So we are only here pleading with you for an efficient mail service.

The Department has also made many savings, and I believe you will agree with me that our present Postmaster General is the best Postmaster General we have had since the turn of the century. [Applause.] He has brought the budget of the Postal Service into balance for 2 years in succession. He is interested in giving good service and, at the same time, in conducting the Post Office Department economically. It was in the purchase of supplies and trucks that he effected savings; in new leases for substations at lower rates; in the consolidation of rural routes; in the elimination of many fourth-class offices; and in the cutting down of subsidies.

All that I am interested in is in appropriating an adequate sum so we will not impair the Postal Service. If we do not increase the appropriations in some of the items, in the next fiscal year Members will realize we have impaired this, the greatest Postal Service on earth.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I think all of us admire the fighting qualities of the brilliant and resourceful gentleman from New York, but in this particular matter he is on the most untenable ground he has occupied during the entire day, because we allowed what the Post Office Department thought we ought to allow to cover this item. We have allowed the enormous increase of $8,100,000 over the appropriation for 1937. We have allowed 1,000 additional clerks to cover the service obligations of the vastly expanding Postal Service, and when the Post Office Department itself says this is ample we believe we ought to give respectful consideration to what the Department itself asks, and we certainly should not plunge blindly into adding enormous sums to this bill that are not asked by the Post Office Department.

In this case the particular increase proposed by the gentleman from New York would add an annual obligation of $2,250,000, which the Post Office Department states is not necessary.

On page 48 of the hearings you will find the testimony of Mr. Donaldson, the Deputy First Assistant Postmaster General, in which he itemizes the various items that would be covered by the $195,000,000, which we allow in this bill, and he states that this amount of $195,000,000, which we have allowed, is the Post Office Department's estimate of the requirements.

Mr. O'NEAL of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LUDLOW. Yes.

Mr. O'NEAL of Kentucky. Is it not also true that the sum appropriated in the bill will provide for overtime, automatic promotions, auxiliary and vacation service, differential for night work, and a minimum of 1,000 additional employees?

Mr. LUDLOW. That is true.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield.

Mr. FULMER. I have had several complaints from third-class post offices stating that they have been unable to get sufficient funds to pay assistants or clerical help the proper amount in line with the increased receipts of third-class post offices. I have had this matter up with the Department, and they have stated that, although they are entitled to an additional amount because of the increase in receipts, they did not have the funds, and therefore they have not made proper payment.

Mr. LUDLOW. I may say to the gentleman that that is not involved in this particular item.

Mr. FULMER. It is not in this item, but I simply want to ask the gentleman if he knows whether or not this is taken care of in the bill?

Mr. LUDLOW. That is an administrative matter, and undoubtedly the funds are provided. Why they have not acted favorably in the cases the gentleman refers to I cannot inform the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MEAD) there were—ayes 25, noes 53.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Special-delivery fees: For fees to special-delivery messengers, $8,000,000.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I rise at this time so as to get in a little ahead of time to prepare the House for an amendment I intend to offer on page 67, and to ask the committee to consider the amendment very carefully.

Custodial employees in the post-office buildings employed by the Post Office Department have their salaries fixed by the Department under a provision of law—section 2, Brookhart Act of July 3, 1930—which authorizes and directs the heads of departments to fix the salaries of positions in the field service to conform as nearly as practicable to the salaries for similar positions as fixed under the Classification Act in the District of Columbia. The Post Office Department is thus required to follow the same salary ranges as appear in the Classification Act for the same kinds of positions, the principal difference being that in the field service the Post Office Department has the final authority as to the grade or salary range in which each position is classified, whereas in the departmental service in the District of Columbia under the Classification Act the Civil Service Commission possesses this final authority.

It is within the discretion of the Post Office Department to increase the salary of any custodial employee to the next higher rate within the range of pay for the grade to which his position is allocated, if the Department thereby does not incur a deficiency. In other words, so long as it has the money for the purpose, it may take this action at any time. Consequently an additional appropriation for the purpose of increasing the salaries of custodial employees of the Post Office Department within the salary ranges in which the Department has already classified their positions would not be new legislation nor would it be inconsistent with any existing law.

On page 67 I shall offer an amendment to raise the appropriation so that these custodial employees may receive the automatic increase—it amounts to $60 a year—which the post-office employees in the Post Office already receive, such as clerks, carriers, and laborers, who are not in the custodial service but in the Post Office Department. The custodial employees do not receive this $60 automatic increase every year .

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. TABER. We have already provided $200,000 for that very purpose.

Mr. CONNERY. No; that is what I wanted to say to my friend from New York. You have provided $200,000 to raise the ones getting $1,140 up to $1,200.

Mr. TABER. Oh, no.

Mr. LUDLOW. The gentleman from Massachusetts is not correct.

Mr. TABER. We have provided $200,000 for the purpose of raising the most-deserving cases, those who have the hardest tasks and have been in the Service the longest—one step. Frankly, I supposed that that was satisfactory. We were particular not to attempt to raise all of those below $1,200, because they were in the smaller places. It would cut out any increases in the cities of 100,000 or over, and we were very particular to leave it open so that the Department might exercise its discretion and take care of the most-deserving cases.

Mr. CONNERY. I am deeply appreciative of what the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Indiana and the chairman of the committee [Mr. BUCHANAN] did in regard to that $200,000, but here is what I am after. Take a city of 100,000. They get $1,200 a year now, but they cannot get that $1,260 next year, and they cannot go up just like the carriers and the clerks and the other laborers in the Post Office do. All I am asking is to have you step them up $60.

Mr. TABER. We are providing the $200,000 so that the most-deserving persons can be taken care of, and we feel that this group is the most deserving of all of the Post Office employees, so far as salary increases are concerned. We have tried to put it where it could be done in any case, within the range of the civil-service law, where the Postmaster General's force think it is correct.

Mr. CONNERY. But $130,000 would have taken care of the ones merely between $1,140 and $1,200.

Mr. TABER. We are not attempting to take care of them.

Mr. CONNERY. I know; but that is what that would have done; that is what I was originally after. The committee gave $200,000 to take care of the most deserving cases.

Mr. TABER. Regardless of the $1,140 or the $1,200 one.

Mr. CONNERY. Regardless of the $1,140 or the $1,200 one. But that will not take care of the automatic increase of your custodial service, starting with $1,140 or $1,200. You have not enough money to take care of that $60 step-up like the others have.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. LUDLOW. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] has correctly stated the situation. We have not undertaken to raise those below $1,140 to $1,200, because that would be manifestly unfair, as those men live in country towns, where the living is cheap, but in cities, where living is more expensive, under the provision that we have made, the Postmaster General in an administrative way can determine those who ought to have it, whether they get $1,200 or not.

Mr. CONNERY. But $200,000 would not be enough to take care of your worthy cases.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, on that very point, Charles I. Stengle, chairman of the American Federation of Government Employees, spoke with the utmost enthusiasm to me today on the provision we have made in this bill for these custodial employees. He said it is very pleasing to them, and he represents them. The whole thing, of course, ought to be determined, not only with reference to this group alone but to all groups of the miserably paid employees of the Government. A study should be made, and all the factors that enter into the compensation of all Government employees carefully weighed; but we of our subcommittee, recognizing that this was probably the most poorly paid of all the groups, wanted to relieve them at once. Many of them are having a very hard struggle. Many of them are married. We made this provision of $200,000 to be distributed administratively so that it would go just as far as possible in alleviating the most deserving of these cases.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. HEALEY. What is the record of salaries for custodial employees in cities over 100,000?

Mr. CONNERY. From $1,200 to $2,800.

There are only about 475 people in the custodial service of the United States who get $2,800. The great majority of this group get less than $2,000.

Mr. HEALEY. The great majority of this group get the minimum.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes; they are in the lower brackets.

Mr. HEALEY. Many of these men are married and have families.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. HEALEY. Yet they live in cities of over 100,000, where rentals are more than $25 a month.

Mr. CONNERY. That is right.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. In the Minneapolis case the great majority of the custodial employees; that is, the elevator operators, janitors, window washers, the fellows who fix doors and do sundry tinkering around the post office get $1,320 a year. Does the gentleman's amendment take care of these men and give them an automatic step-up?

Mr. CONNERY. This takes care of the custodial force in post-office public buildings in the United States. There are two kinds of laborers: There are laborers who come directly under the Post Office Department, and there are laborers in this custodial service which is separate. There is a discrimination between the two classes of laborers.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. What do those laborers handling mail bags get?

Mr. CONNERY. They get an increase of $60 a year.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. And this takes care of the other laborers?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNERY. The only difference between Mr. LUDLOW, Mr. TABER, Mr. BUCHANAN, and myself came up over this amendment. They gave us $200,000 in an endeavor to clean up this situation. They feel that there are parts of the country where they do not want the new set-up, in small towns. They figure they perhaps do not need it so much as in the big towns; but I feel that this automatic increase of $60 a year should be applicable to the small towns, to cities equally, because, goodness knows, they get little enough for the work they do. While I deeply appreciate what my colleagues Messrs. BUCHANAN, LUDLOW, and TABER have done, I would like to see this amendment passed in order that we may do justice to the poorest-paid workers in the Government.

Mr. O'NEAL of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. O'NEAL of Kentucky. Those interested and those who represent these employees are satisfied with this amount. Is not the gentleman satisfied?

Mr. CONNERY. No. I want to answer my friend from Indiana. I have two friends here right now in the gallery, Arthur F. McGlue, State president of the Associated Employees of the Custodial Department of the Post Office of Massachusetts, and Thomas F. O'Malley, president of the Boston local of the same organization. These men organized the custodial workers. They are the ones who asked me to offer this amendment. I know what I am talking about.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as this matter will come up later I move that all debate now close on this pro-forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the genlteman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

By unanimous consent, the pro-forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Star-route service, Alaska: For inland transportation by star routes in Alaska, $207,245.

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Amendment offered by Mr. DIMOND: On page 58, line 17, after the word "Alaska", strike out "$207,245" and insert in lieu thereof "$280,000."

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Chairman, I spoke at some length on this matter the other day. It will not be necessary, therefore, for me to spend much time on it now.

The committee has very fairly given us in the bill $68,692 for a year-round weekly air-mail service between Juneau and Fairbanks, Alaska. The Department recommended and the Bureau of the Budget approved an additional item of $72,755 to extend the air-mail service from Tanacross, in the interior of Alaska, to the larger towns on the coast of Alaska—Cordova, Valdez, Seward, and Anchorage.

We are grateful to have the beginning from Juneau to Fairbanks, but this service will only be half as valuable as it might be, with the other, the star-route service cut off. The only reason for dividing it in the first place was because the route between Juneau and Fairbanks passes over the soil of the Dominion of Canada and it was necessary, therefore, to divide it into a foreign air-mail route and a domestic air-mail route, the domestic route being the star-route service. If it were not for the necessity of flying over foreign territory, we would see this combined in one route between Juneau and Fairbanks and thence down to the coast. When the mail goes to Fairbanks in the interior of Alaska it is highly advisable that the other route be flown and that the distribution be made to the places on the coast which I have named.

In this proposed air-mail service for Alaska there is the same need for distribution of the mail carried that is or would be the case in the United States, and I say this without detracting in anywise from the real value of carriage of air mail on the route between Juneau and Fairbanks even if it goes no farther at this time. But what would be said of a proposal to carry mail by air between Washington and St. Louis and then stop the air-mail service at St. Louis and require mails to go by train between St. Louis and San Francisco? While the case is not strictly analogous to that with which we are confronted in Alaska the circumstances are sufficiently similar to make the comparison appropriate.

It is scarcely necessary to say that the air-mail service in Alaska which we now desire will not at first pay its own way. No mail service in the world ever paid for itself through postage receipts in the first instance. But we are all convinced, and the report of the committee shows the conviction of the committee, that the extension of air-mail service generally over the world is worth while because, in addition to the tangible revenue which goes into the United States Treasury from the sale of air-mail postage, the Nation benefits greatly through the intangible increment to the people arising from the development of trade and commerce. All of the arguments which may be advanced now against the extension of air mail in Alaska were advanced even more vigorously when the air-mail service was first undertaken in the United States and those arguments, while weakening in force and of smaller volume, have continued until the present time.

As I pointed out the other day, it is clearly to the advantage of the people of the United States to develop Alaska. The sums required now for this beginning of air-mail service in the Territory are relatively insignificant when compared with the benefits which will accrue to all of the people of the country through the speeding up of transportation in the vast Territory which extends to a point actually in sight of Asia.

In consideration of this question I am reminded of the strong opposition to the purchase of Alaska in the first instance, so that the Territory was called by the opponents of the purchase "Seward's folly." That purchase price was $7,200,000, but in the few years that have elapsed since 1867, we have seen the commerce of Alaska expand until now each year the trade value of Alaska to the United States, including the total sums of its exports to the United States and of its imports from the United States is each year about fourteen times the original purchase price.

Mr. Chairman, the only defect in the amendment that I offer and which I ask the House now to adopt is that it is too modest. Instead of asking for an increase of $72,755, I should ask for an increase of $100,000 more, so as to be able to furnish a weekly year-round service of mail by air between Fairbanks and Nome covering the settlements in between, and between either Fairbanks and Anchorage and Bethel in the lower Kuskokwim, again giving service to the points between. This is the plan—a definite, reasonable, well-thought-out and well-worked-out plan—which was prepared in the Post Office Department in 1935 and which was submitted by the Department to the Bureau of the Budget and was approved by the Budget for the fiscal year 1937. For that fiscal year the Department recommended and the Budget approved an item of $450,000 for star-route service in Alaska, thus setting up more than $242,000 for new service of mail by air between Juneau and Fairbanks and providing also for the line between Tanacross on the north and Cordova, Valdez, Seward, and Anchorage on the south, and for service on the line between Fairbanks and Nome and on the line either from Fairbanks or Anchorage to Bethel. Unfortunately the committee and the House then refused to approve the project, and so now we have the approval of the Budget only for the service between Juneau and Fairbanks, which has been incorporated in the bill by the committee, and the service between Tanacross and the southern coast towns, which the committee has refused to approve and to put in the bill. The only reason that I confined my amendment to an increase in the item under consideration of $72,755 in an attempt to raise it from $207,245 to $280,000, is to keep within the amounts recommended by the Bureau of the Budget. It is to be remembered, too, that the Bureau of the Budget gave to this proposal the same serious and earnest consideration which has been bestowed upon it by the committee, and yet the Budget unhesitatingly approved of the service for both the fiscal years 1937 and 1938.

I am deeply sensible of the thoughtful consideration of the subject shown in the reference to the Juneau-Fairbanks air-mail route made by the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, Mr. LUDLOW, in the really great and statesmanlike speech which he made on the bill yesterday, wherein he said, in part:

Our subcommittee in approving this comparatively inexpensive service from Juneau to Fairbanks believes it will function in the public interest and will be the means of some valuable pioneering work which will show more clearly a year or two hence how important a part air mail will have in the further development of Alaska.

Mr. Chairman, it is submitted that the justification so clearly and concisely stated by the chairman of the subcommittee on the floor of the House—and stated in the committee report on the bill—for the Juneau-Fairbanks route is equal justification for the route which I am now seeking to have established from Tanacross to the coast. May I repeat that it is really a part and parcel of the Juneau-Fairbanks route and should be so considered.

What we ask is little enough. The day is not far distant when an air-mail route between the States and Alaska will be set up. It is really warranted at the present time, and the only reason it is not now being actively sought is because a large part of that route will be through Canadian territory along which it will be necessary to establish facilities for air navigation. But the service I seek by the proposed amendment can be furnished at once and at comparatively little expense.

Since I spoke on the subject last Wednesday, I now submit the amendment to the House.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. DOWELL. In reference to these star routes, how rapidly are those increasing?

Mr. LUDLOW. In Alaska?

Mr. DOWELL. No. I refer to the paragraph before that. I did not notice it at the time. How rapidly are the star routes increasing throughout the country?

Mr. LUDLOW. Right offhand I do not know whether I can tell the gentleman the concrete figures.

Mr. DOWELL. Approximately?

Mr. LUDLOW. It is all covered in the report. The appropriation for this year is $11,000,000, an increase of $200,000 over last year.

Mr. DOWELL. May I make this further inquiry: Is this service increasing rapidly all the while, and is it to be increased in the future as it has been in the past?

Mr. LUDLOW. According to the appropriations that have been made, it is diminishing, but I think the Postal Service regards it as an excellent and cheap service, and I assume they intend to continue it with reasonable extensions, but I could not advise the gentleman as to the exact details of the program.

Mr. DOWELL. I was only asking for the information as to the increase of this service.

Mr. LUDLOW. I do not know how to answer the question except I have told the gentleman the appropriation that has been made from year to year.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield. I think I can contribute something to this.

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. The mileage of these star routes has been increasing, but the cost has been lowered because the people bid less to get the jobs in the last 4 or 5 years. How long that will continue and how soon it will be necessary if the service is to go along before we will have to provide more money no one can tell. All we know is that the bids that have come in so far are probably on a little lower basis than the old contracts.

Mr. DOWELL. That is the question I am trying to get at. These contracts are all let by bids?

Mr. LUDLOW. By competitive bidding.

Mr. DOWELL. For how long are the contracts made?

Mr. TABER. Four years.

Mr. LUDLOW. They are 4-year contracts.

Mr. DOWELL. Is it not true in a number of these cases a bidder may bid a great deal lower than it is possible to perform this service?

Mr. LUDLOW. That undoubtedly is true. They sometimes bid lower than they can afford to perform the service for, and, as a result, lose money. However, they have a right to submit any bid they want to submit, but it is a matter of historical fact, as the gentleman says, they do sometimes bid lower than they can afford to perform the service.

Mr. DOWELL. Is there any way to help the situation so that this will not occur, or will not continue? In other words, if a person bids too low, is it not possible the service may be very much impaired, and that those who would be able to perform the service at a reasonable figure are being deprived of the opportunity to give a good service to the Government?

Mr. LUDLOW. I may say to the gentleman he is a much older and experienced legislator than I am. Perhaps he could frame a law that would apply. Offhand I do not know what sort of law could apply as long as we observe the system of competitive bidding, because everybody has a right to come in and bid. If they bid too low, that is their bad luck.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I rise now in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alaska [Mr. DIMOND]. I think all of us, and especially the members of the Appropriations Committee, have an exceedingly high opinion of the gentleman from Alaska [Mr. DIMOND], and we appreciate his zeal and efficiency in serving the great Territory of Alaska. Perhaps, if it had not been for his most agreeable personality and his persistency, there would not have been any new air-mail item in this bill for Alaska at all, because there was a good deal of opposition to the granting of an appropriation for this line running from Juneau to Fairbanks on what appeared to be pretty sound ground.

The Territory of Alaska has altogether only 60,000 people, and of those only 30,000 are white people. There could not possibly be any justification for air mail into Alaska except on one ground, and that is, it is a territory of vast and unfathomable riches that awaits development. It is practically in a virgin and undeveloped state as far as we could determine. There is no likelihood of the Territory, on account of its terrain, on account of meteorological and other conditions, being developed unless the airplane performs an important function in that development.

It was practically altogether on the basis of contributing something in a speculative and pioneering way to the development of Alaska that we approved this relatively inexpensive service from Juneau to Fairbanks. We could not possibly see our way clear, though, to approve the shuttle line which the gentleman proposes in his amendment. We do not think it is advisable. We do not think it is desirable to go one dollar further than we have in this bill in order to establish this service from Juneau to Fairbanks. That service after a little time will develop the part that the airplane will perform in the further pioneering of Alaska. Let us not at this time impose another heavy charge on the United States Treasury to add to that service which we have provided for in this bill until we have tried out the service and see how it will operate. That is the sensible thing to do, and that is the course we ought to pursue, keeping in mind the interest of the American taxpayer. With all due respect to the Delegate from Alaska, whom all of us respect, I hope his amendment will be defeated.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield to the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. The gentleman states that there are only 30,000 white people in Alaska. Does the gentleman want to perpetuate that condition by denying them an air-mail service or transportation service?

Mr. LUDLOW. Oh, I do not think that denial of air mail alone would perpetuate that condition.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. The gentleman does not think it would?

Mr. LUDLOW. I think there are factors other than air mail that would perpetuate that condition.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, we are dealing in this amendment as proposed by the Delegate from Alaska with one of the most important developments of the mail in the most important Territory that is under the jurisdiction of the United States.

I recently read in the newspapers that the annual business with Alaska is 12 times the amount that was paid for the Territory by Secretary Seward. If there is any country under the jurisdiction of the United States that is handicapped by impassable barriers and rugged mountain areas and a country that is full of natural, undeveloped resources of minerals and timber and everything that makes for wealth it is Alaska, and yet we will appropriate millions of dollars for other purposes while refusing small appropriations for this Territory.

Why, in the independent offices bill I find two million and a quarter dollars appropriated for printing and binding. I come along the corridors of the House Office Building and see trucks being loaded with waste paper and with books whose bindings have never been opened. We will spend money like drunken sailors for that purpose, but when it comes to giving proper mail service to these hardy pioneers who have penetrated the wilds of Alaska and need to have some means of communication and means of doing business with the outside world, we cut them off with a niggardly appropriation.

It appears that in this bill we have reduced the Budget estimates by some $71,000. We appropriated the other day $1,000,000 for the printing and binding of one governmental department, and yet we could not carry in this bill a little item for one of the greatest Territories that has to be developed by the United States. The Resettlement Administration is developing this country and has tried to establish a colony there at terrific expense, and yet we do not want to help the people who have had the hardihood to go up into this country and establish themselves.

Mr. LUDLOW. The gentleman knows that we carry in this bill——

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Last year you cut out the entire amount. A blank is shown here, so you did not give them anything.

Mr. LUDLOW. We carry in this bill a provision for air service from Juneau to Fairbanks.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. And you are carrying that over British territory. You are doing something for the British side. Why not do something for the American side?

Mr. LUDLOW. That is far more important to Alaska than this shuttle line would be.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. That is the gentleman's estimation. I am talking for the prospector and pioneer in that country who is living there under the most adverse weather conditions to be found on the continent. I am trying to do something to help these people, and I hope the Committee will vote for this amendment in order to give these people some means of communication and put them in touch with the outside world. If we are going to do anything for the air service anywhere, let us do it for Alaska.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina). The question is on the amendment offered by the Delegate from Alaska.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WHITE of Idaho) there were—ayes 16, noes 36.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Railroad transportation and mail messenger service: For inland transportation by railroad routes and for mail messenger service, $107,900,000: Provided, That separate accounts be kept of the amount expended for mail messenger service: Provided further, That there may be expended from this appropriation for clerical and other assistance in the District of Columbia not exceeding the sum of $60,922 to carry out the provisions of section 5 of the act of July 28, 1916 (U. S. C., title 39, sec. 562) (the space basis act), and not exceeding the sum of $33,050 to carry out the provisions of section 214 of the act of February 28, 1925 (U. S. C., title 39, sec. 826) (cost ascertainment).

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, we are approaching the paragraph devoted to the Railway Mail Service. Before we reach that paragraph I want to take opportunity to explain the most important amendment I shall offer today, one that I trust will receive your careful and favorable consideration. But before taking up that amendment I want to pay my respects and commend the members of the Appropriations Subcommittee for their effectiveness in debate and, particularly, for their versatility.

The chairman of the subcommittee on one occasion said, "It is well to follow the advice of the experts in the Department." I wish the committee and the Members of the House would apply that yardstick to the amendments I am offering here today, because every one meets with the approval of the Department.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. In just a moment. Let me first finish my statement.

We read in the committee's printed hearings the chairman's invitation to come back to the committee for a supplemental appropriation if additional personnel prove to be necessary in actual practice. That is a commendable, open-minded attitude; but there is another committee on the Senate side to which we have to bring these matters and can we be sure they will feel the same way? In this other committee one of the members remarked:

As I understand the situation all administrative officers of the Government are forbidden to spend money in excess of the funds appropriated. Do I understand that a department can compel another department to pay more than has been appropriated?

And a little later another member of that same committee, in voicing the policy of that committee, said:

I want to say this, that when Congress acts it is the duty of everyone else in the Department to follow the action of the Congress and not to follow their own views as to what they might be able at a subsequent time to get out of Congress.

In other words, the Senate committee has laid down the policy that the Post Office Department must live within the appropriation. I believe, therefore, that if the Postal Service needs more money, we should appropriate it now.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. I like this talk about economy this afternoon, and I hope there will be more of it every day. I am one of the gentleman who is not apologizing for voting for the famous Economy Act of 1933, and in voting for it I did not vote to cut $300,000,000 from the veterans disabled in France. I voted for a better, fairer arrangement for those men.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIERMANN. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. It did take away $365,000,000 from the disabled veterans, whether they were disabled in France or not, and by increasing the tax on exempt securities 1 percent, we could have gotten $360,000,000 and it wouldn't have taken a spoonful of food out of anybody's mouth.

Mr. BIERMANN. The Economy Act struck off the rolls 438,000 veterans who were drawing compensation for disabilities that had no connection at all with their service in the Army, not even theoretical connection, and I may say I have offered an amendment to the Constitution to abolish all tax-exempt securities.

Mr. CONNERY. But at the same time when you cut off these non-service-connected disabilities—and there had to be 25-percent disability—you just threw those people back on the cities and towns.

Mr. BIERMANN. You did not have to have 25-percent disability to get compensation.

Mr. CONNERY. That is what you have to have to get non-service-connected disability.

Mr. BIERMANN. If the gentleman will read the transcript of his remarks he will see that he did indicate that $300,000,000 was cut off men who had been disabled in France.

Mr. CONNERY. I said some of them wounded in battle and shot in France.

Mr. BIERMANN. I am willing to make a small bet with the gentleman that he indicated the entire $300,000,000 came off men disabled in France.

Mr. CONNERY. We will look it up afterward.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIERMANN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DITTER. I assume that the gentleman takes exception to the treatment that is accorded the veteran growing out of the economy bill. I am wondering whether he, like many of us, was prompted to support the economy bill because of the President's assurance that substantial justice would be done to the veterans.

Mr. BIERMANN. That was one of the reasons, yes; and I will say that under the Economy Act in my own district I had veteran after veteran whose compensation was raised, if he got an injury in France.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. The gentleman will admit also that he grabbed a pretty hot potato, and you had to give it back to the boys.

Mr. BIERMANN. I did not vote to give it back to those without service-connected disabilities. I am not one of those who keep their ears so close to the ground as some of the gentlemen have who have piled up these tremendous deficits.

But I want to talk about the Post Office bill. Yesterday something was said about the losses due to carrying second-class mail matter; that is, newspapers and magazines. That is the biggest hole in the pocketbook of the Post Office Department, but it cannot be corrected by this committee. It has to be corrected by the committee of which the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD] is the chairman.

Second-class mail matter has never begun to pay its way in the United States. So far as I know, I am the only editor that ever had anything to say about it in the columns of his newspaper. I ran a newspaper for 23 years, and occasionally I would mention the fact that we were the beneficiaries of charity from the United States Government. Up until the administration of Postmaster General Burleson the newspapers of the United States and the magazines were carried through the mail at the flat rate of 1 cent a pound, and that does not mean that each piece paid 1 cent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. BIERMANN. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BIERMANN. That does not mean 1 cent per each newspaper or magazine. That means 1 cent for the total of as many pieces as it took to make up a pound of the newspaper or magazine. That arrangement persisted for many years, up to the time of the great Postmaster General Burleson. If it took eight newspapers to make a pound, why, one of those could be sent to Portland, Oreg., one to Portland, Maine, another to Miami, Fla., and another to San Francisco, and so on, until the eight papers were sent out, all for 1 cent.

When Mr. Burleson put into effect something like reasonable rates for second-class matter he was denounced by every newspaper in the United States except the one I was running.

Mr. MOSER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIERMANN. I yield.

Mr. MOSER of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman state what it costs in the county of publication?

Mr. BIERMANN. Yes; in the county of publication the papers go free to all the subscribers except to those getting their mail out of post offices having city mail delivery.

I have received the following figures from the comptroller of the Post Office Department as to the losses that have been incurred in the last 6 fiscal years because of carrying second-class mail matter at less than cost. I will give just even money: In 1931 it was $96,000,000, in 1932 it was $102,000,000, in 1933 it was $88,000,000, in 1934 it was $77,000,000, in 1935 it was $86,000,000, in 1936 it was $90,000,000. In other words, in the past 6 years we have donated to Hearst, to the Chicago Tribune, and the other disreputable, slimy newspapers and magazines of that kind, $542,000,000 out of the Treasury of the United States, and nothing is said about it. These newspapers will tell you that the Members of Congress of the United States are creating a deficit in the operation of the Postal Service because of their franking privilege. The figures show, however, that the franking privilege of all Members of Congress combined costs the Department but a very small fraction of 1 percent of the total revenues of the Post Office Department. But here are the figures that show that in 6 years second-class mail matter in the United States has cost the Treasury more than $500,000,000. If there are any reporters in the gallery or within sound of my voice, I should like to have them make some mention of this fact in their papers this evening or tomorrow.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIERMANN. I yield.

Mr. FULLER. Is it not a fact that the Federal Government has been contributing to Dr. Townsend in helping him to scatter his paper all over the United States?

Mr. BIERMANN. Yes; to the extent of thousands and thousands of dollars.

The plea is made by the newspapers sometimes that this great loss is justifiable on the ground that it is incurred to encourage the dissemination of knowledge. The fact of the matter is that the flat rate on that portion of a newspaper that is devoted to reading matter is 1½ cents a pound. The rate on that portion of the newspaper or magazine devoted to advertising, from which the publisher gets his revenue, is charged according to zones. For example, if a publisher mails 1,000 pounds of his paper or magazine and it turns out, in measuring up the newspaper or magazine, that 40 percent of it is reading matter and 60 percent of it is advertising, then 400 pounds is charged at 1½ cents a pound, no matter where the newspaper goes; and on the other 600 pounds the publisher pays a zone rate according to where the newspaper goes. Here are the zone rates he pays:

Zone	Radius	Rate per pound for advertising
	Miles	Cents
First and second	150	1½
Third	300	2
Fourth	600	3
Fifth	1,000	4
Sixth	1,400	5
Seventh	1,800	6

[1] All beyond.

The injustice of these rates is shown by comparison with parcel-post rates. Parcel-post rates, of course, apply to each parcel separately, even though all go to the same place, and even to the same individual. Rates on newspapers and magazines are calculated by the pound, and in each pound may be 2, 3, 4, or 10 papers, each one going to a different place and to a different person. In equity, the parcel-post rates should be less than the newspaper rates, because the expense of delivery is less. But here are the parcel-post rates, which it is well to compare with the second-class postage rates above:

Parcel-post rates

Zone	First pound	Each additional pound
	Cents	Cents
First and second	8	1.1
Third	9	2
Fourth	10	3.5
Fifth	11	5.3
Sixth	12	7
Eighth	16	11

I should like to see the time come when the proper committee of this House has the courage to tell Mr. Hearst and the publishers of the other papers here in Washington and the newspapers and magazines over all the United States that they have got to pay their way through the Post Office Department of the United States. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Railway Mail Service: For 15 division superintendents, 15 assistant division superintendents, 2 assistant superintendents at large, 1 assistant superintendent in charge of car construction, 121 chief clerks, 121 assistant chief clerks, clerks in charge of sections in the offices of division superintendents, railway postal clerks, substitute railway postal clerks, joint employees, and laborers in the Railway Mail Service, $56,750,000.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

Committee amendment offered by Mr. LUDLOW: Page 59, line 16, strike out "$56,750,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$56,950,000."

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, this particular item has given our subcommittee more perplexity, perhaps, than all the other items combined. We wanted to do the right thing and at the same time we wanted, of course, as with all of these other items, to protect the interests of the taxpayers; so we sought with great diligence to ascertain what figure ought to be placed for the salaries of the Railway Mail Service.

The 1937 appropriation is $57,000,000. The expenditures during the first 4 months of 1937 were at the rate of $56,033,000 per annum. On first consideration of the matter we arrived at a figure of $56,750,000, or $420,000 more than the rate at which the expenditures are running during the first 4 months of the fiscal year 1937. Then, on further consideration of the matter, we appreciated the fact that extra and auxiliary service at certain seasons of the year, Christmas especially, would not be reflected in the expenditures for the first 4 months. Auxiliary service is required also to a certain extent during the Valentine season and during the Easter season.

So we finally decided after calling the officials before us on two separate occasions that our original estimate was too close an estimate, and there should be provided an additional amount over and above the amount carried in this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to read at this time a letter from the Second Assistant Postmaster General in respect to this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. I may say that after a thorough consideration of the matter we decided to offer this amendment which would bring the total amount for salaries in the Railway Mail Service up to $56,950,000, or an additional $200,000 over and above what our first calculation showed might be adequate. I want to read this letter from the Second Assistant Postmaster General, who has jurisdiction over the Railway Mail Service, in which he says that the additional amount of $200,000, as provided in this committee amendment, will be adequate to carry on the Service during the next fiscal year. This letter was just placed in my hands a few minutes ago. It is dated February 19, 1937.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. This letter reads as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, February 19, 1937.

Hon. LOUIS LUDLOW,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. LUDLOW: In response to your telephone inquiry of this morning in regard to the estimate for salaries in the Railway Mail Service for the fiscal year 1938, the following information is submitted:

In the original justification submitted to the Bureau of the Budget under this item, it was estimated that $57,400,000 would be necessary to meet the needs of the Service during the fiscal year 1938, as against an appropriation of $57,000,000 for the fiscal year 1937. After considerable discussion in regard to the matter, the Bureau of the Budget suggested to the representatives of the Post Office Department that it undertake to get along on $56,950,000, and the representatives of the Department agreed to try and do this. Later, when the Bureau of the Budget had further considered this item it approved an estimate of $56,750,000. The Bureau of the Budget having approved only this amount, the Post Office Department is, of course, not in position to ask for any increase.

You have inquired of the Department whether an increase of $200,000 in the amount approved by the Budget would be sufficient for the Department to conduct the Service during the fiscal year 1938. As stated above, the Department cannot request an appropriation greater than that approved by the Bureau of the Budget; but, answering your direct question, the Department believes that it can conduct the Service within the amount named by you.

Whatever amount may be appropriated by the Congress, you have my assurance that no effort will be spared to carry on our operations at a minimum cost consistent with efficient service to the public.

Sincerely yours,

HARLLEE BRANCH,
Second Assistant Postmaster General.

I may say the $200,000 had been agreed upon by the Budget and Post Office Department, which is the estimate that came to us and received our first consideration.

In this letter the official in charge of the administration of the Railway Mail Service says that the amount which we propose in this committee amendment will meet the requirements of the Service during 1938. I therefore ask approval of the committee amendment.

Mr. HOBBS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HOBBS. That applies only to the Railway Mail Service?

Mr. LUDLOW. That is right.

Mr. HOBBS. But not to the Service as a whole?

Mr. LUDLOW. To the Railway Mail Service only.

Mr. HAINES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HAINES. Does not the gentleman read between the lines that the Second Assistant Postmaster General believes he ought to have more money?

Mr. LUDLOW. I can only construe the language that appears in the letter. He says that will be sufficient. I will read his own language again:

Answering your direct question, the Department believes it can conduct the service within the amount named by you.

I do not believe in throwing a lot of money into the Post Office Department that is not necessary.

Mr. HAINES. I believe that, and I do not want the gentleman to throw money into the Post Office Department that they do not have a need for, but, as I stated to the gentleman yesterday, there is no provision for even one additional clerk in the Railway Mail Service for the year 1938. Of course, with this $200,000 I presume that will take care of some additional clerks.

Mr. LUDLOW. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HAINES. It seems to me we ought to ask for a lot more money.

Mr. LUDLOW. I am sure the gentleman from Pennsylvania does not believe we ought to appropriate more than the Post Office Department thinks is necessary.

Mr. HAINES. But I read between the lines.

Mr. LUDLOW. To my good friend, whom I esteem very highly, let me say that I am not an occult specialist. I cannot read between the lines.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I felt quite sure that the chairman of the subcommittee would yield a little on this amendment, but the trouble with him is he did not go far enough. He quoted a letter from the Second Assistant Postmaster General, who, in keeping with the policy of his Department and all Departments, is not violating the rule by going over the head of the Budget Bureau and making a request for an additional appropriation.

But, as I said in the beginning of my many talks today on this subject, I am interested in personnel. I am interested in service. I am interested in building up this great Department so that it will actually serve the needs of the people.

Mr. Chairman, the mail volume is increasing tremendously. How do you suppose they are handling that mail? They have no robots in the Department. They have to work this mail by hand.

Let me quote the record so that you may realize how magnanimous this subcommittee has been in the last 2 or 3 years in providing the Post Office Department with adequate personnel. In 1930, after the depression had struck this country and before the 40-hour law went into effect, we had 20,608 men in the Railway Mail Service. In 1936, after the shorter week made it necessary to augment the personnel, we provided for only 19,911 men in this Service.

Mr. Chairman, I say that the amount provided in this amendment is inadequate. It is an incipient effort, in my opinion, to meet a growing demand for an increased volume of business in this Service. As a clerk in the Railway Mail Service told me only a few days ago—

> Every trip is a Christmas trip. We are overloaded. We work from the minute we get to the depot in advance of train time until long after we end our trip on the road.

That is the trouble with this service. They have less men now than they had in the early days of the depression. They have less men than they had before the 40-hour law made additional appointments necessary. If they received $57,000,000 last year and business has increased, how can you do more work with less money and less men this year?

I may say to the gentleman here is one way they are doing it, and in my opinion it is unfair, and it is penurious on the part of a great government to practice such a policy: They have 1,800 men who have worked regularly in this service day in and day out, many of them, for over a year, who are still classified as substitutes. They are acting clerks. They are getting the minimum wage provided for apprentices in the service.

As I stated a moment ago, the policy has changed in the last few years, and to illustrate this I want to point out that up until a few years ago if a man worked steady 60 days as a substitute he was made a regular as long as the work was there. They are now working over a year as substitutes at the lower pay in order to make both ends meet. This is unfair.

I hope this amendment is defeated and that my amendment, which will come up next, is approved.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has asked why we are proposing in this amendment to appropriate $50,000 less than the 1937 appropriation, which is a very proper question. The reason is they are not going to use all of the money appropriated for 1937. There will be a balance in that appropriation and therefore we do not need to appropriate more.

Mr. MEAD. Yes; and I answered that question when I said you have 1,800 men who are working for far less than the law provides, which is unfair. These 1,800 men who have been substitutes for over a year on regular assignment ought to be given the wage which the law provides.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. How does the gentleman reconcile the statement that he is in favor of building up the Department with his vote against giving a little increase to bring the appropriation for Alaska in line with the Budget?

Mr. MEAD. I voted for the gentleman's amendment and I can see the value of the extension of the service in Alaska. Alaska is a place where we can very well develop the Air Mail Service, not only for the mail service, but for its military value as well, and I voted for the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. O'NEAL of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, we are again facing the same proposition we have been facing all day long. The question is whether we care to increase the service and increase the expense, even though the Department itself states that the amount recommended is adequate.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD] has twitted our chairman about not following the directions of the Department. I call your attention to the fact that the Department states this sum is adequate to carry on a satisfactory service in the Railway Mail Bureau. Mr. Chairman, this estimate of the Railway Mail Service has not been arrived at arbitrarily. Way last summer they went before the Bureau of the Budget and after a most thorough hearing—far more thorough than any gentleman here on the floor has been able to give other than the members of the committee—the Budget recommended a certain amount. This was probably very adequate, but this committee, fearing it had not been liberal enough and trying to help a situation such as the gentleman from New York has stated, goes beyond what the Budget asked for and recommends by this amendment an increase of $200,000.

The amendment of the chairman is offered after a most thorough and careful study by the Budget and by the committee, and it is hoped you will support the amendment because it is fair, not alone to the Service but to the people of this country.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GREENWOOD). The question is on the committee amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MEAD) there were—ayes 56, noes 39.

So the committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Foreign mail transportation: For transportation of foreign mails by steamship, aircraft, or otherwise, $14,054,823: Provided, That not to exceed $9,230,823 of this sum may be expended for carrying foreign mail by aircraft under contracts which will not create obligations for the fiscal year 1939 in excess of $10,221,463: Provided further, That the Postmaster General is authorized to expend such sums as may be necessary, not to exceed $170,000, to cover the cost to the United States for maintaining sea post service on ocean steamships conveying the mails to and from the United States including the salary of the Assistant Director, Division of International Postal Service, with headquarters at New York City.

Mr. HARTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. HARTER: Page 61, line 4, after the period, add the following: "The term 'aircraft' as used herein shall include both airships and airplanes."

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. HARTER. Mr. Chairman, I hope the able and courteous chairman of the committee will permit me to make a statement on the amendment.

Mr. LUDLOW. I reserve the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HARTER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to explain this proposed amendment. The amendment is offered for the purpose of having free and open competition in the matter of contracts for foreign-mail service. The paragraph under consideration at the present time relates to expenditures for foreign-mail transportation. Yesterday in the discussion in committee, the chairman of the committee was asked whether the door was left open to lighter-than-air ships in foreign-mail transportation, and in answer to that question the chairman said:

> I find by referring to the Air Mail Act that the appropriation could not be made in this bill, because it is specifically provided in the Air Mail Act that air mail must be carried by airplanes.

I yield to no one in this House a greater interest in aviation than I have myself, and by this I mean I have the utmost faith in the ultimate outcome of our efforts in the field of aeronautics. I am proud of the record of this country in commercial aviation. As a matter of fact, American air transport leads the world. We are producing large passenger airplanes which are unsurpassed anywhere. But I am also mindful of the achievements that have been made in recent years in the art of lighter-than-air craft. We have witnessed the outstanding records for safety and reliability of Graf Zeppelin and the Von Hindenburg, which has been put in operation recently by the Germans, and we know that people in this country are considering getting into the business of operating commercial lighter-than-air ships. We further know that whenever Government agencies and departments restrict competition, Government costs, as well as the ultimate cost to the taxpayer, rise.

When we have free and open competition it means that we get lower costs on whatever product or type of Government service it may be. We had an example of that, known to many Members of the House, in recent years when we were getting military aircraft of a type that were very inferior to what we obtain at the present time. It was only because, at the instance of this House, restricted competition was eliminated so that companies that had never before had an opportunity to compete upon the procurement of military aircraft had that chance, that we did get superior airplanes and much increased performance. We had open design competition and we received far better models. Got far more for our money. I submit that in authorizing appropriations for awarding contracts of this kind, Congress is responsible to the people of the country to see to it that these great departments of government are so instructed that there is the fullest competition allowed. Let all types of aircraft compete—planes, airships, and any other aircraft that may be developed.

I hope the chairman of the committee will see fit to withdraw his point of order so that we may open up these air-mail contracts to the widest possible competition.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I should like to discuss this question, including the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman want to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. LUDLOW. I do, and I should like, by unanimous consent, to make some observations about the questions raised by the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, the foreign air-mail law approved March 2, 1929, under which the Post Office Department let these foreign air-mail contracts, provides:

> That the rate to be paid for such service for the load of mail provided by the Postmaster General to be carried in a plane shall not in any case exceed $2 per mile each way, plus not exceeding $1 per pound per thousand miles, or pro rata thereof, for greater or less mileage for any mails required to be carried in the same plane in excess of the specified load.

In other words, the Air Mail Act provides specifically that foreign air mail must be carried in airplanes, and, therefore, I submit that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio contravenes existing law and is out of order, and I make the point of order.

Mr. HARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. Yes.

Mr. HARTER. If it is decided that this is a part of the Air Mail Act, and that we cannot broaden the base of competition here, is the gentleman in favor of an amendment to that act so that we may open this to all types of aircraft?

Mr. LUDLOW. Of course, I cannot speak for the subcommittee; but if the gentleman wants my personal opinion, I am free to say that I favor the widest latitude and would open up the whole matter, so that all who desire to bid may have an opportunity to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio reads as follows:

> The term "aircraft", as used herein, shall include both airships and airplanes.

It proposes to place a construction upon the term "aircraft" and give it a broader construction so as to include airships. The Chair is of opinion that this is legislation, and the point of order is sustained.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the zeal of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARTER] in looking after the industries of his district, which he ably does. He represents the district in which the city of Akron is located, and, of course, the city of Akron is intimately associated with the dirigible form of aircraft. His amendment, had it been adopted, I think would have entirely ruined the negotiations now going on between the United States and England respecting the transportation of air mail across the Atlantic Ocean. That is a matter that has been going on for 2 or 3 years. It is the subject of negotiations between the two English-speaking peoples, and from the very beginning it has been oriented around the airplane. These negotiations are complete. England has agreed to the proposal and is cooperating in every way. All of the intermediate-landing points between America and England are controlled by the British. If this tentative agreement is interfered with in any way now, we would probably lose the prospect of ever establishing air mail across the Atlantic, and it would be most distressing to inject this new issue into the situation which might spoil any prospect of effectually establishing trans-Atlantic air mail, and I feel sure the gentleman from Ohio would not want to do that.

Mr. HARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. Yes.

Mr. HARTER. That is the trouble here. Why should the postal departments of the two nations, Great Britain and the United States, confine their bids to one particular type of air transportation? They are interested in the quick delivery of mail. Why should they exclude another type of aircraft, when perhaps by its inclusion they could get fairer figures?

That is what I am striking at, lack of competition on the part of our Post Office Department. Congress should require them to allow the fullest competition in a matter of as great importance as this. May I also say to the gentleman, Mr. Chairman, that while it is true that the lighter-than-air industry has been centered in my district, it is also a fact that my district manufactures myriad articles that go into the assembly of heavier-than-air craft; and probably the most extensive investigations into de-icing and various safety devices are carried on in my home city—Akron; so my interest is not alone in lighter-than-air ships but in heavier-than-air craft as well. I believe, however, in the principle of competition, the fullest and most open competition, in contracts of this kind.

Mr. LUDLOW. I may say to the gentleman that I absolutely agree with him, but—and I am not criticizing anybody—nobody ever suggested dirigibles in connection with this trans-Atlantic service until this bill was brought into the House.

Were we to adopt such an amendment it would be simply to throw out of the window this trans-Atlantic air service between the United States and Great Britain, and nobody wants to do that.

I may say to the gentleman that his opportunity will come later, for negotiations are in progress between the United States and Germany looking to the establishment of a trans-Atlantic service between these countries that will, in all probability, be on the basis of the use of dirigibles, because Germany is committed to them. The Graf Zeppelin has made a wonderful success in long-distance flights, and it is expected that negotiations for this American-German service will be on the basis of the use of dirigibles.

It could not possibly be that service will be established across the Atlantic by the use of dirigibles under the existing airplane act, which fixes a limit of $2 per mile as compensation. I take it that no dirigible on earth could run for such a small amount as that. I think the gentleman's course, in his zeal to protect the interests of his constituents, is to go before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads with a proposed amendment to the Air Mail Act, which would open the matter up, so that in the future this question could not be raised, so that in the future all kinds of aircraft might be considered legally in trying to arrive at a conclusion as to the character of service. I would like to make that suggestion to the gentleman.

Mr. HARTER. If the gentleman will yield further, with reference to the cost of transportation of mail by lighter-than-air craft, I refer the gentleman to the talk made by Dr. Eckener in Detroit on January 17 of this year, where he showed that it was very profitable to carry mail at a rate comparable with the $2-per-mile rate set up by the Post Office Department.

Let me say to the gentleman that the reason, probably, why the matter of the competitive use of airships was not considered before his committee was that the Post Office Department was proceeding on its own initiative. Nobody knew what was going on until the bill came on the floor.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent at this time to read a letter from the Second Assistant Postmaster General in respect to this proposal.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. I read as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, February 18, 1937.

Hon. LOUIS LUDLOW,
House Office Building, Washington.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Replying to your request by telephone that I comment on the proposal to amend the post office appropriations bill, as reported by your committee, by inserting after the word "aircraft", in line 19, page 60, the following: "And for transportation of such foreign mail the Postmaster General is authorized to contract for service by airships, as well as by airplanes", I submit the following:

My understanding is that those who are advocating the use of airships, or lighter-than-air craft, only have in mind the employment of such aircraft in overseas service. The only new overseas service contemplated in the appropriation act which your committee has recommended is a twice-a-week round trip service between the United States and England. If such a service is to be provided, it must be done under the terms of a reciprocal arrangement with Great Britain. For more than a year the Government of Great Britain has been negotiating with the United States for a reciprocal service, whereby a British company will fly two round trips a week over the Atlantic and an American company will fly a like number of trips.

In their negotiations the British have concerned themselves entirely with airplanes for this service and have not indicated that they ever contemplate the use of airships. They are now constructing special types of airplanes for this service and in their negotiations with the United States they have confined their discussions to the use of airplanes by both the British and the American companies.

With Great Britain controlling the "stepping stones" over the Atlantic air route, it is necessary, if the United States is to participate in the proposed reciprocal agreement, that the American company employ airplane equipment.

Under these circumstances it does not appear possible that even if the act is amended as proposed the United States will be in position to use airships in reciprocal trans-Atlantic service.

Germany has not only indicated its interest in an arrangement for reciprocal airplane service between the United States and Germany, but it has also indicated interest in reciprocal airship service between the United States and Germany. However, the appropriation for trans-Atlantic service sought by the Department and approved by your committee is designed to cover only the reciprocal British-American service. The questions of additional trans-Atlantic service to Germany and France are for future consideration. Missions from both Germany and France have had these questions up with the United States.

If Congress desires that reciprocal trans-Atlantic airship service be provided, it would seem that such provision should be made in a special act which would set out the conditions upon which it is to be performed and the kind of contract it should be operated under, along with the maximum amount of mail pay—whether by the pound for mail carried or by the miles flown.

I do not see how the objective desired by the advocates of an airship subsidy can be attained by the simple inclusion of the proposed amendment to the Post Office Appropriation Act.

The foreign air-mail law approved March 2, 1929, under which the Post Office Department lets contracts, provides "that the rate to be paid for such service for the load of mail provided by the Postmaster General to be carried in a plane shall not in any case exceed $2 per mile each way, plus not exceeding $1 per pound per thousand miles, or prorate thereof for greater or less mileage for any mails required to be carried in the same plane in excess of the specified load, * * *."

Sincerely yours,

HARLLEE BRANCH,
Second Assistant Postmaster General.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contract Air Mail Service: For the inland transportation of mail by aircraft, and for personal services for examining and auditing the books, records, and accounts of air-mail contractors, as authorized by law, and for the incidental expenses thereof, including not to exceed $22,200 for supervisory officials and clerks at air-mail transfer points, and not to exceed $46,460 for personal services in the District of Columbia and incidental and travel expenses, $14,250,000.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, we are now on the item for the operation of the domestic air-mail service for the next fiscal year. I want to say to the members of the Committee that there has been no new air-mail service for 2 years. This is indicative of the policy of the committee—that is, we are restricting instead of expanding postal facilities.

A bill which I have introduced at the request of the Department will provide for 3,000 additional air-route miles. I doubt very much whether the enactment of this proposed bill will be beneficial to any section of the country that believes it is entitled to air-mail service, because the appropriation provided here will not permit of much expansion. Members interested in the extension of the Service have little to hope for from the appropriation we are now considering. While it is true that the appropriation bill includes a little more than was provided for this Service last year, the chances are that needed increased frequency, increased schedules on existing lines, together with the possibility of increased rates approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission, will consume the additional appropriation.

A year ago I pointed out to the committee that the appropriation for Air Mail Service was inadequate. According to the record the chairman of the subcommittee referred to the fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission had authority to regulate rates, and stated that the committee did not appropriate more money because the Interstate Commerce Commission might reduce the rates. Everybody familiar with the rate structure, the law, and the bidding for contracts realized that if the Interstate Commerce Commission took up the matter of rates after the initial bidding there was only one way the contracts could be adjusted, and that was upward. Some of the rates were as low as 9 cents a mile, and you could not operate a truck on the highway for that.

The Interstate Commerce Commission did adjust the rates, and they adjusted them upward. The Post Office Department was then forced to come before the committee and ask for a deficiency appropriation. They received one of $1,084,000, but when it got into the Senate it was not greeted as cordially as it was by this subcommittee, and the provision as it was finally adopted prevented payment to the air-mail contractors for increased rates approved prior to the passage of the bill. The contractors have thousands of dollars coming that they will probably have to go into the Court of Claims to collect.

I was right a year ago, and I am quite sure I am right today about the appropriation being inadequate. If any Members are interested in increasing the schedules of existing service in his community, or if any one of you believes your district is entitled to new air-mail facilities, please realize that you cannot have it unless you increase the limited appropriation contained in this bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I will not take the full 5 minutes, and I am only prompted to take the floor at this time by the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD]. Here is a specific instance, and no doubt there are many others. Ever since I have been a Member this last time an application has been pending for an extension, or what is really a hook-up of an air-mail route from Pueblo, Colo., to Wichita, Kans. Those two cities are important terminals. That extension would complete a north and south hook-up from the far Northwest down through Kansas, connecting at Wichita with an established line to Oklahoma and Texas. We are put off from year to year for the reason that the law does not make sufficient provision to install that service. Those are not only important cities but this route would traverse the populous Arkansas Valley, in which are situated important towns and cities. This bill carries as a total for the Air Mail Service $14,250,000, but I notice in checking over the explanation of the gentleman from Indiana, the chairman of the subcommittee, of that amount there will only be available $400,000 for new routes. That will provide for some 1,600 miles of new routes.

Mr. LUDLOW. And extensions.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. There is $400,000 there for new routes and extensions. Ten percent is for extensions and 90 percent for new routes.

Mr. LUDLOW. I may say it is contemplated there shall be 1,620 miles, approximately, of new routes, and the balance will be extensions.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. What does that amount to? Here is an illustration: The route I am talking about would be about 400 miles. In other words, it would take one-fourth of the total new mileage provided for in this bill to put in that one new route between Pueblo, Colo., and Wichita, Kans. You can imagine what a fat chance our people out there in the great open spaces will have to get recognition.

Mr. MEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MEAD. This is the comment of the Department on this appropriation, so that the gentleman may understand the situation:

If the Interstate Commerce Commission should increase the rates on any routes, and they have on every one they tackled so far, it will be necessary for the Department to request a deficiency appropriation.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I cannot understand the niggardly policy that is being followed in connection with this legislation. I do not see why they do not provide for more mileage and for a larger appropriation, leaving it to the determination of the Post Office Department to some extent as to what routes they will put in. I know very well they are in favor of that route, and have been all these years. I know they would put it in if they were able, considering the pressure for new routes, perhaps, that comes from more populous sections of the country having greater influence in Washington, but we can never get it under this legislation.

The Clerk read as follows:

Rural Delivery Service: For pay of rural carriers, auxiliary carriers, substitutes for rural carriers on annual and sick leave, clerks in charge of rural stations, and tolls and ferriage, Rural Delivery Service, and for the incidental expenses thereof, $92,500,000.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. LUDLOW: On page 61, line 24, before the period, insert the following: ", of which not less than $250,000 shall be available for extensions and new service."

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, speaking in reference to the proposed amendment, I may state that the Post Office Department advises us that under our proposed appropriation for Rural Delivery Service, which is $92,500,000 for 1938, the Department can maintain all existing services and spend $250,000 for the establishment of new services.

Mr. Cole, representing the Post Office Department, appeared before our subcommittee, and we had quite extensive hearings because we wanted to be sure that this Rural Delivery Service would not stagnate and there would be some provision made for new routes and new services.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not sure I heard the reading clerk accurately. Does the gentleman's amendment read to the effect that of this $92,500,000, not less than $250,000, and so forth?

Mr. LUDLOW. That is right.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then the entire $92,500,000 could be used?

Mr. LUDLOW. Of which not less than $250,000 shall be available for extensions and new services.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does not the gentleman mean "not more than $250,000?"

Mr. TABER. No; the gentleman from Indiana is right. The gentleman means that at least this amount must be spent for extensions. Frankly, it is my opinion, as well as the opinion of the Committee, there will be much more than $250,000 available for extensions, and we do not want to limit the Department to that amount.

Mr. LUDLOW. I am informed this is the usual language employed in limitations of this kind.

I quote from the hearings before our subcommittee when Mr. Cole appeared, representing the Department, and I asked Mr. Cole this question:

On the basis of the proposed appropriation of $92,500,000, you figure that out of our appropriation you would have at least as much as $200,000 for new services and extensions.

Mr. COLE. Yes.

Mr. LUDLOW. And, probably, more than that?

Mr. COLE. Yes; I think it would be around $250,000. I think it might probably run as high as $300,000, but when we try to figure so close, or when we get so close to the deadline, it is hard to figure.

So taking his own testimony and the testimony of the Post Office Department, we did not use his high estimate of $300,000, but we took his certain estimate, the one he is absolutely sure of, which is $250,000 available for additional service, and we provide in this limitation that at least $250,000 shall be available to establish new routes and extensions.

I ask that the Committee adopt the amendment.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I send to the desk an amendment which I offer as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

Amendment offered by Mr. MEAD as a substitute for the committee amendment: On page 61, line 24, strike out "$92,500,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$92,800,000."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, for the information of any Members here who are interested in the extension of a rural service or in the establishment of a new rural route, it is my judgment that the only way it can be secured is by the Committee of the Whole making provision for it at this time.

The current appropriation for the Rural Delivery Service is $93,200,000. The Budget approved an appropriation of $92,500,000. If the Department had $300,000 more it could establish new routes which are needed and provide necessary extensions.

One hundred thousand dollars of this amount is needed for new routes, the applications for which have been approved by the Department and are being held up awaiting the authorization of sufficient allowances by Congress. Surveys have been conducted by inspectors and interested Members of Congress have called on the Department urging the institution of these services.

Two hundred thousand dollars of the money contained in my proposed amendment is for extensions of existing services; in other words, $300,000 is necessary for new routes and extensions now pending in the Department.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. McFARLANE. I know that in my district I have some routes and extensions that are badly needed that are being held up on account of lack of funds. I hope the gentleman's amendment will be adopted.

Mr. MEAD. I may say to the gentleman we have already reduced this appropriation under the appropriation for 1937 by $700,000.

We cannot expect the Department to do more work and handle more mail with less personnel. Just look at the record. It is exactly similar in this instance to several others that I cited here today. In 1930 we had 43,000 rural letter carriers. Today we have 34,000. Of course, much of that is due to consolidations. Again I ask you, How are you going to do more work, handle more mail, create more routes, and approve more extensions on less money? It just cannot now be done. Not only that but we need more rural service than previously, because the Department has drastically reduced the number of fourth-class postmasters in the last few years.

In 1920 we had 41,000 fourth-class postmasters. In 1936 we had only 31,000.

How can you build up a great service agency by reducing the appropriations year after year? We are cutting the appropriations altogether too fine.

Mr. TABER. The appropriation carried here is $92,500,000. On the basis of expenditure so far this year, down to the 1st of January, the amount used this year would be $91,633,328. That is more than a million dollars below the current appropriation. Already there have been established upward of 3,000 extensions to rural routes, and we are told by the Department that there will undoubtedly be established in the rest of the year enough to total 5,000. There has been much saving on account of consolidations and there is much more to come. The Department figures that they will be able absolutely, and without figuring the usual amount of lapses and that sort of thing, to provide at least $250,000 for extensions. Frankly, figuring the thing out, what the situation in the Department and the Service actually is, I can see no reason why there will not be $500,000. So far as the Department thinks, there will be $300,000.

Mr. LUDLOW. Is it not true that in the first estimate the Department officials submitted to us they said there would be $750,000?

Mr. TABER. That is correct.

Mr. WOODRUM. As I understand the situation, it is this—that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana will definitely earmark not less than $250,000 for extensions and additions to existing service; that there is money enough to carry the service as it is and a minimum of $250,000 for extensions.

Mr. TABER. Absolutely.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. STEFAN. I am interested in the Rural Delivery Service. I am wondering if the people of the cities are as much interested in that as we of the country are. You cut this appropriation down $700,000. Does this mean that you are going to curtail the extensions in the rural service?

Mr. TABER. There is no intention of curtailing the extensions in the rural service, but there is going to be less money used this year by far than the amount which we carry for next year, and this fund that we are carrying in this bill provides an increase over the amount that will actually be used by the Department in this current fiscal year.

Mr. STEFAN. Does that mean that applications in my district for extension in rural service will not be given any attention because they have curtailed the number of extensions to 6,000?

Mr. TABER. Oh, no; the 6,000 extensions mean that on an average each congressional district will get about 20 extensions.

Mr. STEFAN. They are curtailing it to 20 extensions to each district?

Mr. TABER. No; that is what they are getting this year, and that is quite a substantial number. It is more than has been allowed for a long time.

Mr. STEFAN. We need a lot of extensions in my district.

Mr. TABER. This would provide a lot.

Mr. STEFAN. Only 20.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York as a substitute for the committee amendment.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following preferential motion, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HOFFMAN moves the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer that motion because I wanted to offer an amendment to the last paragraph read to strike out $92,500,000 and insert in lieu thereof $92,500,105.90, but was cut off by the motion of Mr. WOODRUM limiting amendment and debate.

The reason for my amendment was that over in the Fourth Michigan District we have some rural routes. One of them we wanted to change. It would make no increase in the length at all and would entail no extra cost. One tenant house that was being served was being moved away. We wanted the route changed so that five or six people who owned their farms—not under the farm tenancy bill, but who have owned their farms for years—could get rural service. They did not see fit down in the Department to do that. They denied the change, although the change would neither have lengthened the route nor have added to the cost of the service from that particular office.

Another route was over in another county, where the extension would serve eight families, all American born, all able to read and to write; but it would add 2 miles to the route and would cost the amount of this amendment, $105.90. The Department could not see it. Listening as I have today, however, to the appropriating of these millions and millions of dollars to carry the mail across the ocean so that somebody over in London would get a letter a little quicker, and all the other millions that were being appropriated for air mail, I could not understand why, both of these counties being Republican territory, the Postmaster General should not be helped by these two changes to get a fair share of these tons of propaganda to these Republicans so they might be converted. [Laughter.]

The administration and its Party has always been against the privileged few, the economic royalists, the Wall Street manipulators of financial matters, the apostles of greed, and so, while the administration today was busy appropriating these millions of dollars for those it has so roundly and constantly condemned, it seemed appropriate to me to put in a word for the common man, the forgotten man, the man who lives back in the country and who, while he is not interested in foreign mail nor in air mail, yet is interested in receiving letters from his relatives and friends and obtaining perhaps a monthly or weekly farm paper.

I want these people to learn. They have lived along there all these years without ever discovering they were misused. They have been living peaceably and contentedly; they have been making a small profit in spite of the depression; they own their own farms; and unless someone tells them that they are underprivileged and misused, they are never going to learn it, and when they do learn it, I would like them to be able to get Sears, Roebuck, Montgomery-Ward, and these other mail-order house catalogs, so they can buy these bathtubs that Mrs. Roosevelt regrets the people never learned how to use, and all those things. The people to whom I refer are honest, taxpaying, law-abiding, thrifty, industrious, American citizens, but the Government takes no account of them. It is interested in getting the mail to London, to Paris, and to other foreign cities.

I do hope the gentleman will not object but will let this little $105 go through, because this is the first time I have made a Democratic speech since I have been here, the first time I have spoken in favor of appropriating money; and it is only because some of you gentlemen have convinced me that we ought to get a part of ours while you are getting yours that I speak today.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the motion. I do so not that I am especially concerned about the motion.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the motion will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. May I not still be heard?

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has the right to rise in opposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion has been withdrawn.

Mr. WOODRUM. A motion cannot be withdrawn except by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent was granted.

Mr. WOODRUM. I did not hear the Chair put the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment before the House is the substitute amendment of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may again be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again read the amendment.

Substitute amendment offered by Mr. MEAD to the committee amendment: On page 61, line 24, strike out "$92,500,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$92,800,000."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman from Michigan made a motion to strike out the enacting clause. The gentleman from Indiana was on his feet asking recognition of the Chair. The gentleman from Michigan said he withdrew his motion.

Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a motion cannot be withdrawn without unanimous consent, and no such request was made or granted. The gentleman from Indiana is entitled to recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair put the request of the gentleman from Michigan to the House, and no objection was raised.

The Chair ruled then that the motion had been withdrawn.

Mr. WOODRUM. If the Chair says the Chair put the request, then, of course, the Chair put it; but I did not hear the proceedings, and the gentleman from Indiana was on his feet seeking recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. Several gentlemen were on their feet. The gentleman's request was not objected to.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York as a substitute for the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WOODRUM) there were—ayes 38, noes 49.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the committee amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The committee amendment reads as follows:

Page 61, line 24, before the period, insert the following: ", of which not less than $250,000 shall be available for extensions and new service."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Post-office stationery, equipment, and supplies: For stationery for the Postal Service, including the money-order and registry system; and also for the purchase of supplies for the Postal Savings System, including rubber stamps, canceling devices, certificates, envelopes, and stamps for use in evidencing deposits, and free penalty envelopes; and for the reimbursement of the Secretary of the Treasury for expenses incident to the preparation, issue, and registration of the bonds authorized by the act of June 25, 1910 (U. S. C., title 39, sec. 760); for miscellaneous equipment and supplies, including the purchase and repair of furniture, package boxes, posts, trucks, baskets, satchels, straps, letter-box paint, baling machines, perforating machines, duplicating machines, printing presses, directories, cleaning supplies, and the manufacture, repair, and exchange of equipment, the erection and painting of letter-box equipment, and for the purchase and repair of presses and dies for use in the manufacture of letter boxes; for postmarking, rating, money-order stamps, and electrotype plates and repairs to same; metal, rubber, and combination type, dates and figures, type holders, ink pads for canceling and stamping purposes, and for the purchase, exchange, and repair of typewriting machines, envelope-opening machines, and computing machines, numbering machines, time recorders, letter balances, scales (exclusive of dormant or built-in platform scales in Federal buildings), test weights, and miscellaneous articles purchased and furnished directly to the Postal Service, including complete equipment and furniture for post offices in leased and rented quarters; for the purchase of arms and miscellaneous items necessary for the protection of the mails; for miscellaneous expenses in the preparation and publication of post-route maps and rural delivery maps or blueprints, including tracing for photolithographic reproduction; for other expenditures necessary and incidental to post offices of the first, second, and third classes, and offices of the fourth class having or to have rural delivery service, and for letter boxes; for the purchase of atlases and geographical and technical works not to exceed $1,500; for wrapping twine and tying devices; for expenses incident to the shipment of supplies, including hardware, boxing, packing, and not exceeding $55,000 for the pay of employees in connection therewith in the District of Columbia; for rental, purchase, exchange, and repair of canceling machines and motors, mechanical mail-handling apparatus, accident prevention, and other labor-saving devices, including cost of power in rented buildings and miscellaneous expenses of installation and operation of same, including not to exceed $35,000 for salaries of 13 traveling mechanicians, and for traveling expenses, $2,491,100: Provided, That the Postmaster General may authorize the sale to the public of post-route maps and rural delivery maps or blueprints at the cost of printing and 10 percent thereof added: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the purchase of furniture and complete equipment for third-class post offices except miscellaneous equipment of the general character furnished such offices during the fiscal year 1931.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MCFARLANE: On page 64, line 19, after the word "added", insert a period and strike out all after the word "added", line 19, down to and including line 23.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the wording of this amendment, which strikes out the following language:

Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the purchase of furniture and complete equipment for third-class post offices except miscellaneous equipment of the general character furnished such offices during the fiscal year 1931.

I understand there is about $100,000 worth of equipment down there in the post office that is not now being used which these overworked and underpaid third-class postmasters could have made available to them if this amendment is agreed to. This would give the Post Office Department the opportunity to let them have this furniture. I see no reason why these third-class postmasters should be forced to buy new equipment when this equipment is available down there and now owned by the Federal Government at this time. It should be made available to these postmasters. Therefore, I ask the adoption of the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. MEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFARLANE. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MEAD. I feel sure the chairman of the subcommittee will be for the gentleman's amendment, because for 2 years now both the Department and the Budget have been recommending a fairly substantial item rather than this prohibition so as to repair these lock boxes after they are removed from buildings and put them in third-class post offices, thereby effecting a saving both to the postmasters and to the Government. Therefore, I am quite sure, if you remind the gentleman that both the Budget and the Department favor your amendment, that he probably will support it.

Mr. McFARLANE. I think the statement the gentleman just made is very clear, and since the Appropriations Subcommittee has been following the recommendations of the Budget so closely, I cannot understand why we cannot use the post-office equipment that is now owned by the Government and effect a substantial saving. I do not understand why they have not followed the Post Office Department officials and the officials of the Bureau of the Budget in this particular instance. I hope my amendment will be adopted. If it is adopted it will save the Government a considerable amount of money, and will work to the advantage of the third-class post offices.

The representative of the Post Office Department appeared before the subcommittee and asked that this provision be eliminated, and asked for appropriations of $100,000 with which to supplement funds on hand to purchase furniture for third-class postmasters. This sum, together with the large amount of post-office furniture on hand, will be ample to meet the needs of the Post Office Department in supplying third-class postmasters with necessary equipment. Under the law first- and second-class postmasters are furnished all of their equipment by the Government and proper allowance is made for fourth-class postmasters. Only third-class postmasters must arrange for their post-office equipment, and this has worked a tremendous hardship upon many of the third-class postmasters throughout the Nation.

I wish to cite some examples of the abuses of the leasing racket that has apparently grown up in this country.

The postmaster at Salina had rented the equipment from the Keyless Lock Co. at the rate of $148.20 per year for 8 years, or a total of $1,185.60. As the result of the investigation by the inspector looking toward making a lease at Salina, with the Department supplying the equipment, the Department purchased all new modern standard equipment from the Keyless Lock Co. for the sum of $1,129.36.

In support of the contention that the lease contracts which the Keyless Lock Co. made with various postmasters were unfair and that the company was quite willing to cancel the agreements rather than to force postmasters to continue paying rentals, it has been ascertained that the Keyless Lock Co., in many cases involving purchase of Government-owned equipment, offered to sell to the Department, at a greatly reduced price, the second-hand equipment which was then being rented to the postmasters.

Oldham, S. Dak.: Postmaster rented equipment from the Keyless Lock Co. at $165 per year for 7 years. Department bought new equipment from Morgan Lumber & Manufacturing Co. for $822.76.

St. George, S. C.: Postmaster rented equipment from the Keyless Lock Co. at $171.60 per year for 5 years. Department bought new equipment from the Keyless Lock Co. for $944.30 f. o. b. Indianapolis, Ind.

Pemberville, Ohio: Equipment rented by postmaster from the Keyless Lock Co. at $152.40 per annum for 7 years. Department purchased new equipment from Federal Equipment Co. for $892.

Cumberland, Ky.: Screen line only rented from the Keyless Lock Co. for several years at $273 per annum. Department purchased new equipment from the Keyless Lock Co. for $1,311.33.

Whitesville, W. Va.: Lessor rented equipment from the Keyless Lock Co. at $150 per annum. Department purchased new equipment from Federal Equipment Co. for the net sum of $818.90. The Keyless Lock Co. offered to sell to the Department, for $495, the second-hand equipment it was renting to the postmaster for the sum of $150 per year. This proposal was rejected, however, inasmuch as the used equipment was not standard.

Tinley Park, Ill.: Postmaster paid $264 to the Keyless Lock Co.—per year—for equipment, 2 years. Department purchased equivalent equipment from McLane Manufacturing Co. for $752.40.

Gridley, Ill.: Postmaster paid $142 per year to American Post Office Equipment Co. for equipment for 8 years; value, $1,190. Department purchased new equipment from the Keyless Lock Co., delivered and installed, for $1,036.33.

Isle, Minn.: Postmaster paid $144, per year, rent to the Keyless Lock Co. for equipment, 6 years. Department purchased new equipment from the Keyless Lock Co. (delivered and installed) for $805.49, less 5 percent, 10 days.

There seems to be some dispute as to the amount of appropriations requested by the Post Office Department in order to supply third-class postmasters with necessary equipment and in order to furnish them with the post-office furniture owned by the Government now on hand.

In the post-office hearings on this bill, on page 359, Hon. S. W. Purdum states:

Mr. PURDUM. $250,000 are the figures for the estimated obligations for 1938.

Mr. TABER. For third-class offices?

Mr. PURDUM. No, sir; $150,000 is to be used for first- and second-class offices, and $100,000 is for third-class offices * * *.

It may be that in a number of cases the offices would have partial equipment, and this would supplement such equipment. At the last Congress there was a bill passed by the House of Representatives granting postmasters at third-class offices 50 percent of their box-rent collections. The post-office records show that the collections of box rents for the fiscal year 1936 amounted to $1,968,175.81. One-half of that would be just a little less than $1,000,000, assuming that such legislation would be enacted. * * *

Mr. Chairman, at offices of the first and second class, the Government furnishes the equipment, and at those offices the Government receives every penny of revenue that is taken in. At post offices of the fourth class, legislation provides that 15 percent of the earned compensation goes to the postmaster toward defraying his expense for quarters, light, and fuel. At third-class Presidential offices, the Government receives all the revenue; yet the provision made for third-class offices is in no wise comparable to the provision made for equipment for other Presidential offices. We believe that it would be equitable and economical in the end to provide as much equipment as possible for offices of the third class.

Mr. LUDLOW. Is that the proposed legislation you refer to?

Mr. PURDUM. Yes, sir; it passed the House of Representatives.

Mr. LUDLOW. How many third-class postmasters are there?

Mr. PURDUM. According to the records, there are at this time 9,841.

Mr. LUDLOW. So that if 100 post offices are equipped for $100,000, the equipping of all of them would cost the taxpayers ultimately about $10,000,000.

Mr. PURDUM. No, sir; I do not think so.

Mr. LUDLOW. Why not?

Mr. PURDUM. For these reasons: There will be surplus Government-owned equipment from leased quarters where post offices are moving into new Federal buildings; and also equipment transferred from old Federal buildings replaced by new structures erected in pursuance of congressional authorization. For several years past we have been making use of this surplus equipment referred to, which includes thousands of lock boxes, making a wide distribution of same to offices of the third class where the needs appeared most urgent. We believe that it is in the interest of the Government to make use of the said equipment, instead of discarding it as in former years. We are satisfied that our action in the premises has made for better equipped third-class post offices and for increase in the postal revenues.

Mr. LUDLOW. That is the Post Office Department's own estimate. I refer to the estimate of $10,000,000 as the ultimate cost of this proposal. A few years ago Mr. Nichol, who was at that time the Deputy Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, testified before our committee, to be exact on February 3, 1932, that this identical program would cost $10,000,000.

Mr. PURDUM. We are not responsible for the estimates made at that time.

Mr. LUDLOW. By a process of calculation, if it would cost $100,000 to equip 100 offices, and there are nearly 10,000 offices, it if were projected to that total number, the cost would be about $10,000,000.

Mr. PURDUM. Mr. Chairman, the cost could not possibly be anywhere near $10,000,000, for the reasons that approximately 2,000 such offices are in leased quarters; equipment is being provided by the lessors; and partial equipment, including many thousands of post-office lock boxes secured from vacated buildings, is now installed in a great many other third-class offices, and we are continually receiving from time to time such equipment, including post-office lock boxes, from buildings as they are being vacated. Having the foregoing in mind, Mr. Chairman, is the reason why we requested only $100,000. Fifty percent of box rents at offices of the third class would amount to approximately $1,000,000 a year.

Mr. PURDUM. At the present time there are some postmasters at third-class offices who own their equipment. They have purchased it from their predecessors or from other former postmasters or from manufacturers. There is a considerable number who are renting their equipment under lease contracts carrying so much rental per month or quarter during their incumbency as postmaster, regardless of the length of time of service. We have records to show that lessees have paid in some instances an amount that greatly exceeded the original value of the equipment.

* * * * * * *

Mr. PURDUM. My understanding is that in some cases, where the equipment is under lease to the postmasters the amounts that have been paid exceed the original cost or value of the equipment.

Mr. LUDLOW. There are some 10 companies, as I understand it, in this business. It is wide open competition, and, that being true, why should there be any excessive charges?

Mr. PURDUM. It is wide open competition in what respect—in leasing or buying?

Mr. LUDLOW. I know there are about 10 companies that supply this furniture. What number of them furnish it under lease, I do not know, but it is not a closed matter.

Mr. PURDUM. I think very few are furnishing it under lease to postmasters; in fact, my best information is that there are only two companies leasing to postmasters at this time, namely, the Postmasters Supply Co. and the Keyless Lock Co.

Then as to the number of offices the $100,000 appropriation would serve, pages 366 and 367, Mr. Purdum states:

Mr. PURDUM. If this $100,000 is granted, we could apply it to several hundred post offices.

Mr. LUDLOW. I did not understand you, Mr. Purdum.

Mr. PURDUM. If this $100,000 is granted, we could apply it to several hundred post offices.

Mr. LUDLOW. That is the only reason I said 100—because you mentioned that number in your testimony a little while ago.

Mr. PURDUM. That was to cover this completely. You pressed for an estimate.

Mr. LUDLOW. Would you try to apportion these among all the States, make them regional, or how else would you select them?

Mr. PURDUM. We would handle each case on its merits and take the most urgent ones first.

If this amendment is adopted all equipment would be purchased through competitive bidding and this would relieve the third-class postmasters from the great injustices now being done them. In the hearings Mr. Purdum states, page 367:

Mr. PURDUM. Should our request be granted, any article that we might purchase would be secured under competitive bidding, through the purchasing agent.

Mr. LUDLOW. There is no government manufacturing involved?

Mr. PURDUM. No, sir; none whatever. There is no repair work involved either. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that the situation as it exists is equitable and just with reference to the postmasters of the Presidential class. I believe that the time will come when complete equipment will be furnished to offices of the third class by the Government, or a considerable part of the postal receipts will be paid out for the rental of equipment.

Mr. LUDLOW. What is the average salary of third-class postmasters?

Mr. PURDUM. The salary ranges up to $2,300 per annum.

Mr. LUDLOW. That is the top salary?

Mr. PURDUM. Yes, sir. Those salaries have the same bases as the salaries to postmasters of the first and second classes.

Mr. LUDLOW. You mean the salaries are based upon receipts?

Mr. PURDUM. Yes, sir; entirely on the postal receipts.

Mr. LUDLOW. What percentage of them are in the higher bracket and what percentage are in the $1,500 class?

Mr. PURDUM. I should have to check up on that. I am told that $1,700 a year is the average salary of postmasters at offices of the third class.

Mr. SLATTERY. In justifying the appropriation for "unusual conditions; separating mails; clerks in third-class post offices", I am sure it came out, either this year or last year, in the testimony of the First Assistant Postmaster General that the third-class postmasters are probably the worst off of any postal employees. That testimony was given in a plea for more allowances for clerks at third-class post offices.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas is wrong when he says that the adoption of this amendment would save the Government a lot of money. On the contrary, it would subject the Government to an expenditure of about $10,000,000.

The equipment for these offices is now furnished either by rental or by purchase by postmasters. It is proposed by the pending amendment to initiate a program here involving $100,000 a year to enable the Government to purchase this furniture and give it as a present to the third-class postmasters who are now equipped with furniture. Instead of this being an economical move, it would be most wasteful, because it would mean the throwing out and destruction of the furniture which they already have.

Mr. Chairman, this proposal has been before our subcommittee ever since the late beloved Speaker Joseph W. Byrns occupied the position that it is now my honor to hold. Mr. Byrns very vigorously opposed it as a wanton and wasteful use of the public funds and not justified by any economic reasons; but, on the contrary, he was convinced that it showed a partiality because this equipment would have to be furnished in limited amounts over a long period of time to certain favored employees out of this group of postmasters. If you will read the hearings you will find completely set forth the views of Mr. Byrns under whose leadership this inhibition was inserted in the bill, and year after year we have been carrying the same inhibition because we do not think the Government ought to enter into that sort of thing and the taxpayer should not be saddled with this additional expense, amounting according to the testimony of the Post Office Department officials, to an aggregate of $10,000,000.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

First of all, I want to preface my remarks by making the observation I did not introduce this amendment; nevertheless, I think the amendment is one worthy of favorable consideration. In view of the fact that the committee has provided this inhibition against the use of funds for the purpose of installing equipment of this kind, it might be well for the matter to rest as it is until the Senate committee takes up the bill.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. McFARLANE. Why not strike this provision out of the bill and let the Senate, if it sees fit, put the necessary appropriation in there so that we can use the $100,000 worth of furniture and post-office equipment that is laying there idle. Why should it be laying there idle?

Mr. MEAD. I think the gentleman is correct. We should take out the inhibition.

So that you may have the idea correctly in your mind when you vote on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas, may I say that first- and second-class postmasters have their equipment furnished to them by the Government. The fourth-class postmasters are given an allowance for rent, light, and fuel. Third-class postmasters are called upon to furnish their own equipment. The equipment that we talk about here consists of lockboxes, windows, and so forth that you see when you enter the lobby of a third-class post office.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. McFARLANE. Where do these third-class postmasters buy this equipment?

Mr. MEAD. They do not buy it. They lease it.

Mr. McFARLANE. Where do they lease it?

Mr. MEAD. I would prefer to have the chairman of the committee answer that question in his own time.

In view of the fact third-class postmasters are called upon to furnish their own equipment, it was thought by our committee and by the Department years ago that in justice to them a start should be made so that some day the Government would own this equipment.

Now, a start has been made and a great many third-class postmasters are in leased buildings where this equipment is furnished to them, but there are still thousands of them in the clutches of this firm that exacts extortionate rates and charges that are out of all proportion. There are leases now in existence that are 20 years old and they were liquidated, so far as the actual cost of the equipment is concerned, in 10 years.

This system is unfair, it is unjust, and the Department would favor legislation or an appropriation which will allow them to eventually rid the Service of this nuisance.

This is certainly unfair when we consider third-class postmasters, one has to pay a large rental for his equipment and turn over all the money he collects to the Department, another postmaster has this equipment furnished him by the Department, while still another has this equipment furnished by the owner of the building in which the post office is located.

I hope some action is taken shortly to prevent this company from charging exorbitant rates on the leasing of this equipment to our third-class postmasters. [Applause.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what my parliamentary rights may be, but I wish to speak further in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. LUDLOW. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD] has indicated there is just one company concerned here. The names of the companies were set forth in the hearing and there are 10 companies that furnish this equipment. No one is closed out and every postmaster has the right to rent this furniture or to purchase it, whichever he chooses, because it is a matter of competition.

With respect to the statement made in regard to extortionate rates, it was developed that the average charge for this equipment is $3.75 a month to the postmaster. Of course, if a postmaster rents for a long period of years, even at an acknowledged fair and moderate rental, there comes a time, perhaps, when the amount he pays in rent equals the purchase price of the equipment, but the same is true of an individual who rents a house. The time may come when his rental, even if it is on a low basis, will be equal to the purchase price of the house. The same is true in regard to anything that is rented.

This matter has been gone into repeatedly before our subcommittee, and I would like to quote what Chairman Byrns put into the RECORD when he first insisted that the Government should not go into this paternalistic enterprise, because that is what it is. The Government is taking on activities that it should not take upon itself, and it is also a discrimination in favor of a very limited group of postmasters that would be furnished this furniture as against all the other postmasters in the same group.

I may also state that there is not any rehabilitation of second-hand furniture involved here, as someone has asserted, but it is proposed to furnish new furniture and facilities for these post offices.

Mr. Byrns made this statement in the RECORD:

Some of these postmasters would have to wait 20 years for an increase—

He held that this was tantamount to an increase in salary—

In other words, they would probably have two or three successors before they would get the same increase, and I would take it that one is as deserving as the other, and so, frankly—and I am just one member of the committee—it looks as if this is one appropriation that should be cut out. I cannot see it in any other light, especially when we have to reduce appropriations.

Mr. O'NEAL of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield.

Mr. O'NEAL of Kentucky. Is it not a fact that if the proposed amendment were adopted it would mean millions of dollars of extra expense to the Government?

Mr. LUDLOW. It was testified by the Post Office officials that it would mean $10,000,000 to that Department.

Mr. O'NEAL of Kentucky. Is it not a further fact that if the subject under discussion were properly looked into it would not be handled through this amendment but in some other way?

Mr. LUDLOW. I think that is quite true. It should be looked into by some legislative committee, I take it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MCFARLANE].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LUDLOW and Mr. O'NEAL of Kentucky) there were—ayes 38, noes 46.

Mr. MCFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

PUBLIC BUILDINGS, MAINTENANCE AND OPERATION

Operating force: For personal services in connection with the operation of public buildings, including the Washington Post Office and the Customhouse Building in the District of Columbia, operated by the Post Office Department, together with the grounds thereof and the equipment and furnishings therein, including telephone operators for the operation of telephone switchboards or equivalent telephone switchboard equipment in such buildings jointly serving in each case two or more governmental activities, $17,200,000: Provided, That in no case shall the rates of compensation for the mechanical labor force be in excess of the rates current at the time and in the place where such services are employed.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONNERY: Page 67, line 24, after the word "activities", strike out "$17,200,000" and insert "$17,975,740."

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, this matter has been thoroughly discussed. I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this provision close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that all debate upon this amendment close in 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Indiana says, this amendment has been thoroughly discussed. I merely wish to call the attention of the House at this time to the fact that there are 11,304 custodial workers who receive less than $2,000 a year, and only 475 in the whole custodial force who receive over $2,000 a year, and that the highest any one of them can receive is $2,843.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD at this time a list of custodial employees and their salaries, received in 1937 and to be received in 1938.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the gentleman should ask that in the House.

Mr. CONNERY. Very well.

The list referred to is as follows:

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. HEALEY. Those employees receiving more than $2,000 are skilled persons?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes. And most of those who receive less than $2,000 are skilled workers.

Mr. HEALEY. They are holding positions that call for technical skill?

Mr. CONNERY. There are engineers, firemen, watchmen, firemen-laborers who would require a considerable apprenticeship to be admitted into a labor union to perform their work on the outside.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, what is the wage of those employees?

Mr. CONNERY. It averages $1,140. Some of them are lower than that—as the charwomen, for instance—and some salaries go up to $2,800, although there are only 475 persons who receive more than $2,000.

Mr. DOWELL. And the gentleman's amendment will increase those?

Mr. CONNERY. All it will do would be to give these people $60 a year automatic raise, as everybody else in the Department gets; and then only up to $240 increase in one grade. One laborer works alongside another in the Post Office Department, doing practically the same work, and one man gets a step-up of $60 a year, and the man in the custodial work, who does almost the same work, does not get it. The most that any below $2,000 can step up is $240. I hope the amendment will be agreed to. It takes care of the lowest paid employees in the United States Government—charwomen, people who wash the windows, who do heavy manual labor, who keep the post offices clean, and who see to it that the American people can be proud of the condition of their public buildings. Certainly they deserve well of their Government.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I rise to support the amendment of my colleague, and I wish to point out that these persons who are in the higher brackets, mentioned by my colleague, some 475 of them, who do receive over $2,000 a year, are technically trained men—men who, if they were employed in private industry, with their skill and knowledge and experience, would receive much higher wages. The ordinary custodial employee, however, in cities of over 100,000, the janitor in the post office, the man who does the cleaning up around there, the man who has to have considerable skill himself, because he has to be a plumber and a locksmith and an electrician in order to do odd jobs, gets $1,200 a year, or $25 a week. In a city of over 100,000 population it is very difficult, as you can very easily realize, for a man to support himself and family on $25 a week.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEALEY. I yield.

Mr. CONNERY. I know my colleague also wanted to call attention to the fact that when these custodial employees work nights they do not get the night differential that the clerks, carriers, and other postal laborers get.

Mr. HEALEY. That is true. I happen to know a great deal about this class of employees, because I maintain an office in the post-office building in my own home city. There are only four or five of these custodial employees there, and these men perform all sorts of work—hard, difficult, arduous labor. I know how difficult it is for these men to live in that community on an income of $25 a week. Why, they cannot hire a house there—anything that is fit for human habitation—for less than $30 a month. Think of taking $30 a month for rent out of an income of $100 a month!

I am conscious of the fact that tremendous drains are being made on the Government and that all employees are looking for increased compensation, but I agree with my colleague that we ought to start down at the bottom, down at the base of the whole structure, and raise the wages of these men who are working in the Government service for what I think is unconscionably low compensation. I do not think that any man who preforms the work required of these men in the service of the Government ought to receive less than $1,500 a year. The Government ought to set the example of hiring men to perform such arduous duties and not pay them such inordinately low wages. So I hope that this amendment which will provide for step increases for this grade of employees will be agreed to.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, our committee is just as sympathetic with these poorly paid employees and just as solicitous of their welfare as any gentleman in this House, and that is the reason why we have made a start in this bill toward alleviating the situation of these excessively underpaid employees in the custodial service.

I believe, as does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HEALEY], who just spoke, that a higher minimum ought to be fixed for all underpaid Government employees; and we understand that the Bureau of the Budget is investigating this matter very thoroughly right now, and that Senator MCCARRAN and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] have a bill which will take care of this situation as applied to the entire Government service; and, for one, I give that bill my most sincere benediction and my hope that something tangible will develop from it and that all low-paid groups—this is only one of them—will have justice done them.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. Briefly.

Mr. CONNERY. I would like to call my friend's attention to the fact that these men were shifted over from the Treasury Department to the Post Office Department and a discrimination exists between laborers in the custodial service and laborers in the Post Office Department.

Mr. LUDLOW. There is no quarrel between the gentleman from Massachusetts and myself, we both feel deeply and earnestly for these men. But I submit that we have made a very great start in this bill toward helping them What we have attempted to do is to extend aid to the most deserving of these people by including an item of $200,000 in this bill. This will provide step-ups for something like 3,400 of these people who are poorly paid, who have families, and who are entitled to an increase.

I would remind these gentlemen that the head of the American Federation of Government Employees, Mr. Stengle—he is, of course, solicitous for all poorly paid groups—has complimented us on the fine start we have made toward relieving these underpaid employees. We think we have made a good start. Speaking for myself, and I think I voice the sentiment of all members of the committee, but certainly my own sentiment, is that this matter will be pursued further through general legislation to take care of the entire situation as far as these excessively underpaid groups are concerned in the entire Government service. But we do not think that it is fair that the very well-meant effort we are making here through the appropriation of this $200,000 for the most deserving of these people, the money to be distributed administratively, ought to be upset at this time. It is a good start in the right direction; and, as I say, it has the support and approval of the gentleman who is authorized to speak for the Government employees.

We have not gone as far as we would like to, we have not gone as far as ultimately no doubt will be gone in the way of general legislation on this subject; but let us give some time to the committees to work out the Connery-McCarran bill and see if it cannot be done in a way that will do justice to all of these groups—and there are other comparable groups in many of the departments, groups that are as low-paid as this custodial group in the Post Office Department. We are sympathetic with all these groups, but groups in the other departments do not come under our jurisdiction. This group does because it comes under the bill we are considering. We feel that we have gone a long way to assist them in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LUDLOW) there were—ayes 41, noes 38.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. LUDLOW and Mr. CONNERY to act as tellers.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported there were ayes 51 and noes 48.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. No part of the appropriations contained in this act shall be used to pay the compensation of any person detailed or loaned for service in connection with any investigation or inquiry undertaken by any committee of either House of Congress under special resolution thereof.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against section 5 on the ground it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard further?

Mr. RANKIN. If the Chair desires to hear me, yes.

Mr. WOODRUM. We would like to hear the grounds of the gentleman's point of order.

Mr. RANKIN. If the Chair desires to hear me, I should like to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman briefly.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, this is clearly legislation on an appropriation bill and is not in order under rule XXI, which provides that no proposition the effect of which is to change existing law is in order on a general appropriation bill unless it appears upon the face of the bill that the proposition will retrench expenditures in one of the three methods specified. It must reduce the number or salaries of Government employees, reduce the compensation of any employee, or reduce the amount of money appropriated by the bill.

It does neither of these. In fact the result of the operation of this section will be to increase the expenditures, if anything, or it will result in additional expenditures.

Mr. Chairman, this question has been passed upon time and time again. I have looked up some of the decisions, and I find, for instance, one by Mr. Currier, of New York. I call attention to the fact that the same provisions of the rule were in existence at that time. Mr. Payne, of New York, was in the chair on February 4, 1896, and here is his decision:

In the opinion of the Chair, it is no answer to a point of order that the amendment changes existing law to say there is at present no statute law upon the subject.

The mere absence of a law, Mr. Chairman, on the subject makes this legislation upon an appropriation bill, even if it does not change existing law. This adds new law.

Mr. Payne further stated:

In the absence of statute law there is still a rule established by custom. That is the law, and any proposition which enacts positive law is a change of existing law in that respect. The enactment of law where none now exists is a change of existing law. It is acknowledged by the mover of this amendment that it does enact positive law where none now exists and in that it changes existing law. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. Chairman, he could not have described the provision of a bill more completely if he had had this bill before him. Here we have a provision of law that proposes to change existing law that has been in operation for years, or insert new law, and changes a custom that has existed ever since this Government was founded.

There are so many of these decisions I will not attempt to read them all. However, in one of the decisions I find this statement:

The Chair also finds that Mr. Hatch, of Missouri, in 1894 ruled an amendment out of order because it limited the discretion of the Postmaster General. This amendment clearly proposes to limit the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy. There is a long line of authorities which the Chair will not take time to cite.

That is from a decision rendered by Mr. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania, in 1904.

We find also that this question was passed upon in a recent Congress by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], I believe in 1925, and he used this language, and almost the same proposition was before him:

In the judgment of the Chair the amendment is submitted in its proper place inasmuch as it immediately follows a paragraph of limitation, and as it has the form of an amendment of limitation. However, the Chair is compelled to face one aspect of the issue at once, and he feels that he could not satisfy his own judgment in the matter of limitations if he took the ground that a limitation of this sort is necessarily within the contemplation of the second paragraph of rule 21 or is of the class that has been so often permitted under the customary extension of its application. He believes he should look through the form to the purpose. So doing, he finds the purpose to be legislative, in that the intent is to restrict Executive discretion to a degree that may be fairly termed a change in policy rather than a matter of administrative detail. For this reason he feels it is incumbent on himself to sustain the point of order.

In other words, the gentleman from Massachusetts, presiding at that time, stated that you have to look beyond the form to the intent of the legislation. What is its intent?

Its intent is to write into an appropriation bill permanent legislation or legislation changing a policy of this Government or practices or customs that have been carried on for years.

I have also before me a decision in 1907 by Mr. Currier, of New Hampshire, in which he says:

The existing law has received a construction by the officers charged with the duty of administering it, and that construction the Chair feels bound to follow. The proposed amendment changes existing law as it is construed by the proper officer by changing the divisor. This is in the guise of a limitation; but it has been held over and over again here that a limitation is negative in its nature and may not include positive enactment establishing rules for executive officers. It has been held further that while limitation may provide that a part of an appropriation shall not be used except in a certain way, yet the restriction of executive discretion may not go to the extent of an imposition of new duties. And the limitation on the discretion exercised under the law by a bureau of the Government is a change of existing law.

The limitation on the discretion exercised under the law by a bureau of this Government is a change of existing law. And that is what this is. Further—

The decision on the question of limitation, the attempt to draw a well-defined distinction between changes of existing law and a proper limitation are among the most difficult questions that the Chair is ever called upon to decide. "Where a proposed limitation might be construed by the executive or administering officer as a modification of a statute and change of existing law, it could not be held to be a limitation."

Again, Mr. Chairman, we find this statement:

Does the limitation curtail or extend, modify or alter existing powers or duties or terminate or confer new ones? If it does, then it must be conceded that legislation is involved for without legislation these results could not be accomplished.

Now, I have some other decisions here, Mr. Chairman, but I do not think it is necessary to go into any more of them.

Let me now read this section to the Chair. Section 5 provides that—

No part of the appropriations contained in this act shall be used to pay the compensation of any person detailed or loaned for service in connection with any investigation or inquiry undertaken by any committee of either House of Congress under special resolution thereof.

You are attempting to curtail, as a former presiding officer has said, practices that have been in existence ever since this Government began, and I submit it is not only a limitation that is unauthorized by law, it is not only inserting new law into the statute, but it is clearly legislation, and new legislation, upon an appropriation bill, and therefore is not in order.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, almost without exception, as I could follow the gentleman, the decisions which he read and quoted were Holman rule decisions referring to cases where it was sought through the device of a limitation to change existing law; and, as one of the decisions so appropriately remarked, many times there is a line of demarcation hard to find or hard to decipher, and many of the cases present extremely difficult problems. There is no such problem involved here at all. Section 5 of this bill is a clear-cut, unconditional, unequivocal, direct limitation on the funds appropriated in this bill.

It is always proper and appropriate to provide specifically that you cannot use these funds for a specific purpose and to name the purpose. Let us make a practical application and look through the substance to the intent.

This bill appropriates money for the Treasury and Post Office Departments. Aside from not changing existing law, I may say to my friend from Mississippi this amendment is trying to enforce existing law, because there is law upon the statute books which says it is unlawful for any bureau or department to spend money for any purpose except that for which money is appropriated; but notwithstanding this positive direction of law, we find departments taking money appropriated for one department and spending it for another purpose.

Now, what do we have here? We say to the Postmaster General that it shall be unlawful for him to take any money here appropriated for employees in the Post Office Department and pay them for doing work somewhere else. This is a clear-cut, unconditional limitation upon the direct funds appropriated in this act.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. I say to the gentleman this does not affect the salaries being paid. It does not change, reduce, or alter a single salary being paid in the Department.

Mr. WOODRUM. It does not have to do that.

Mr. RANKIN. This is simply trying to prevent the Department from permitting these men to help Members of Congress, the House or the Senate, in these investigations, as they have been doing for 150 years.

Mr. WOODRUM. Again my friend confuses the Holman rule with a limitation on an appropriation.

Mr. RANKIN. No; I do not.

Mr. WOODRUM. If the gentleman will permit, I think he does. Under the Holman rule, where you seek to change existing law by legislation on an appropriation bill, you have to show that you are saving money.

Here is an appropriation bill where we are directly appropriating money, and it is perfectly legitimate and proper to say, "You can have it for this, but you cannot have it for that", earmarking and speaking specifically of the funds appropriated here. We do not have to show that it will save money. As a matter of fact, it will save money.

I do not wish to prolong the discussion further, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I submit to the Chair that on the face of it, this section does not save a single dollar; it does not curtail a single salary. It does not reduce the number of employees. It does not do any one of those three things that would make it in order, but on the other hand it is likely to result in additional expenditures, because all these men in the departments capable of doing this work, may not be called, men who are efficient and trained for this purpose, to assist the special Senate committees, or special House committees, yet we would have to go into the Treasury to appropriate additional money for that purpose. So, instead of the far-fetched argument that it is saving money, I submit that it is costing money, and it is clearly legislation on an appropriation bill, and the point of order should be sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order made by the gentleman from Mississippi is directed against section 5, the last section of the bill, which reads as follows:

SEC. 5. No part of the appropriations contained in this act shall be used to pay the compensation of any person detailed or loaned for service in connection with any investigation or inquiry undertaken by any committee of either House of Congress under special resolution thereof.

The question raised is whether this is a proper limitation to be placed on an appropriation bill. If it be a proper limitation, then the point of order cannot be sustained. It is a question whether any law is changed by this section. If special committees desire to employ any employee from a department, they can still employ them by making proper arrangements and paying for them out of the appropriations that have been made for the special committees, but this is an appropriation bill for the Treasury and Post Office Departments, and the question arises whether the House in Committee of the Whole can place a limitation not only that will save money, but will direct to whom that money will be paid.

There are many decisions defining limitations on appropriation bills, but one of the best that the Chair has found is one given by Chairman Nelson Dingley, of Maine, on January 13, 1896, which is found on page 47 of Cannon's Procedure of the House of Representatives. The ruling of the Chairman at that time was as follows:

The House in Committee of the Whole has the right to refuse to appropriate for any object, either in whole or in part, even though that object may be authorized by law. That principle of limitation has been sustained so repeatedly that it may be regarded as a part of the parliamentary law of the Committee of the Whole.

There are many precedents, but the Chair has selected two that he thinks are in point. On April 30, 1921, the Army appropriation bill was under consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, when the Clerk read the following item:

For aviation: To officers of the Air Service, $1,000,000: Provided, that no portion of this appropriation shall be used for pay of Reserve officers.

Mr. Hull, of Iowa, made a point of order against that item and said:

It changes the law; it does not reduce the amount at all; it simply says you shall make the payment to the Regular Army and not to the Reserve officers, and that is not a limitation; the amount is not reduced at all. The money will be paid out just the same. It will be paid out to officers of the Regular Army.

The Chairman on that occasion was Mr. Tilson, and he ruled:

The Chair will call attention to the fact that Congress could make any limitation it pleases. It could say that the money could not be paid to the Regular officers of the Army. The Chair must overrule the point of order.

That decision may be found in Cannon's Precedents, volume 7, section 1587.

Again, on December 8, 1922, the Treasury Department appropriation bill was under consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, when the paragraph providing an appropriation for the enforcement of the National Prohibition Act was reached Mr. TINKHAM, of Massachusetts, proposed this amendment:

Add a new provision, as follows: "Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for the payment of a salary of any employee who shall not have been appointed after a competitive examination and certification by the Civil Service Commission."

Mr. Madden made a point of order against this amendment and cited the section of the law which permitted the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the Attorney General to select certain employees to help enforce the law.

The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole at that time was the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. Sanders; and the Chair reads his decision:

The Committee on Appropriations, of course, have no legislative powers except such as are prescribed by the rules, and an amendment cannot be offered which proposes legislation unless it comes within the rules. However, there is a very long line of decisions which permits limitations upon appropriations. An amendment may be offered which provides that no part of this appropriation shall be paid to any certain class of employees, and the Chair knows of no reason why an amendment which provides that no part of this appropriation shall be paid to employees unless they have certain qualifications is not a proper limitation. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

That decision may be found in Cannon's Precedents, volume 7, section 1593.

The Chair thinks that the section of the bill against which the point of order is made is a proper limitation upon the use of the appropriation contained in the bill. It does not necessarily have to reduce the amount that shall be paid. It can direct to whom it shall be paid. The Chair is of the opinion, therefore, that the section is clearly within the power of the Committee of the Whole to place a limitation upon an appropriation; and the Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. RANKIN moves to strike out, beginning on page 72, line 9, all of section 5.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this motion conclude in 10 minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I shall reserve the right to object on that. Wait until the 10 minutes is up. Other Members realizing the importance of this amendment probably will want to be heard on it.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I am of course unalterably opposed to this provision of the bill, the result of which will be to paralyze those investigations that have been carried on by Senate committees for many years. I submit, further, that the Senate is the only place we have been able to get investigations into various and sundry things touching the very economic life of the American people ever since I have been a Member of the House, to say the least. If this provision had been in the law 10 years ago or 15 years ago, as I pointed out the other day, there could have been no Teapot Dome investigation, we would have been precluded from the investigation of the cotton exchange that brought about the reforms there; it would have paralyzed the investigation of the holding companies, and it would have paralyzed investigations that are going on at the other end of the Capitol now.

It does not cost any money. These people will still be on the pay roll, and you will not be crippling any department by striking this provision out and permitting those employees who have the information that is necessary in these investigations to come before these committees and assist. They tell us we can get a separate appropriation. How does that comport with the idea that this saves money? Oh, you try your case on the floor of the House and the Senate and inform the very ones you are going to investigate of all the charges and the avenues of information you expect to explore.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that this provision should be stricken from the bill; and it will be stricken from the bill at the other end of the Capitol. It is a question of whether or not the House wants to gag the United States Senate, or try to do so. I appeal to you, therefore, to vote for this amendment, to vote this section out of the bill, in order that the Senate of the United States and special committees of this House may be at liberty to continue those investigations, some of which are needed now. I appeal to every Member within the sound of my voice to vote this section out of the bill. It is unnecessary; it is absolutely tying the hands of those courageous men at the other end of the Capitol who have rendered such great services in the past and who are rendering such great services now. It ought never to have been put in the bill. It is going mighty far afield when the Appropriations Committee writes legislation of this kind into the law to say to a special committee of the House or to a special committee of the Senate that they cannot use people already on the Federal pay roll to help investigate the matters that come before them and in which the people of this country are vitally interested.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. It seems to me, in line with the gentleman's argument, that under these special investigating committees we can send for the employees of these departments and secure the information we need without any additional employees at all, and it will actually save money if we strike this provision from the bill.

Mr. RANKIN. Why, of course. If you do not do it, what is going to be the result? Every time you have an investigation or a special committee you cannot send for people already on the pay roll and who have information the committees need, people who are peculiarly fitted to assist, unless you get a special appropriation for that purpose. This means that your investigation will close. This means a muzzling of the United States Senate so far as these salutary investigations are concerned.

I sincerely trust, Mr. Chairman, that the House will vote this section out of the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the time has come to cross this creek. A similar section was placed in a previous appropriation bill while in the House only to be taken out in the Senate. It is in this bill, and it is the intention of this committee as expressed on the floor to include it in other bills.

What is the intent of this section? Of course, impugning the motives of no one, it is very clear, as shown by the amendment, the intention is, as expressed in the previous debate on the other bill to stop investigating committees from using employees down here in the various departments, also using employees on W. P. A. rolls. What does that mean? It means when you have good information, given you confidentially as a Member of the House, and information upon which you can rely and you come in here and offer a resolution to investigate something which needs investigation, you are going to have to disclose the facts and put the people you intend to investigate on notice. In other words, you try your case down here in the Well of the House and you let the culprits escape before you can get your resolution passed giving you proper authority and funds to investigate them.

What do we do now under our investigations? In connection with every investigation that has been conducted within my knowledge in recent years the information has been secured by investigators going into the files of the people we investigate, and securing the information upon which the exposure is made. If it had not been for that system we would not have been able to get the information.

If this section is adopted, you will stifle any chance to get results from these investigating committees. You know it. If you do not know it you will find it is true. I think it is penny-wise and pound-foolish. Oh, you say you can cross these creeks when you get to them, and when you offer the resolution. You might as well forget the resolutions if you are going to follow this system and allow this committee to run the Congress. There will not be any use offering them if you have to expose your hand on the floor of the House trying to get the resolution passed.

You will put the people you are investigating on notice. They will strip their files, run to cover, and you will get a water haul if and when you make the investigation. It has obviously been quite evident you get a very small appropriation out of this committee to investigate with anyway.

Mr. Chairman, we might as well call a spade a spade. That is what we are running into. The House has been slow to investigate anything within my knowledge, and we have gotten water hauls on what we did investigate.

The Senate for many years has made the exposures through careful investigation, through trained investigators, who have gone out and got the information before the people could run to cover and hide the information. Take the investigations of the Teapot Dome, the ocean-mail contracts, lobbying, Power Trust, and other investigations that have saved the Government millions of dollars. Those disclosures would not have been made had such a section been in effect during the time these resolutions were called up for consideration.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFARLANE. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Is it not a fact these big investigations are carried on right through long recesses of Congress and that a need for this assistance could be developed when Congress was not in session and no appropriation possible, which would simply stop the investigation?

Mr. McFARLANE. That is true. There are many employees down in the departments who are not busily engaged all the time. They are glad to put in this additional time furnishing information to the Congress. They are down there anyway. They have a knowledge of these facts. They can give this information with little or no additional expense. It we keep this section, you are tying our hands; you are making it almost impossible for the Government to develop its case and to see that justice is done. I hope that course will not be pursued. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, having listened to the splendid words of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], who is the dean of the House, I, being a member of the Farmer-Labor Party, have long been an admirer of the Roosevelt administration in that they have discovered facts concerning the Government of the United States which have been the basis of most of the New Deal legislation.

The common people, not having the advantages of the press on their side, have had to fall back for information on their own resources for facts discovered by the United States Senate.

A couple of weeks ago we had the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] rise on this floor and denounce the Secretary of Labor, Madam Perkins, in no uncertain terms because she had refused to furnish certain facts to this House concerning the strike at Flint, Mich. Now, I have watched that same gentleman from Michigan, and he has supported amendments of this nature which are trying to cripple the detailing or the finding of events so far as facts are concerned by this Congress. It is interesting to note that in this strike there was a standstill in Michigan between labor and the C. I. O. on one side and General Motors on the other until Senator LA FOLLETTE and his Senate Civil Liberties Committee, by a few shrewd questions, exposed certain matters on General Motors in his special investigation, and it is noticeable that when the La Follette investigation hit at the heart of the matter the strike ended, and it ended in favor of labor.

This matter can be discussed pro and con, but it seems to me that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] is essentially correct in that we should not disturb the fact-finding activities of the United States Congress because, after all, you are the only group, except the President, that is responsible to the people of this country, and this New Deal legislation, which was based on these exposures, was five times killed by the Supreme Court, not 300 yards distant, and I really think you gentlemen who are for the New Deal ought to stand by the New Deal activities in this respect. [Applause.]

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Was the activity on the part of this Civil Liberties Committee in payment of the $500,000 campaign contribution by the C. I. O.?

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. I will say this much. I should rather take their money than the money of the fat boys in Wall Street. [Applause.]

Mr. HOFFMAN. All right; but was it?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. Whenever the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] tells us how much money the Republican Party got from those who are being investigated, then we will match facts with him.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, there is not involved here any question of trying to stop any investigation. I believe the members of this committee will believe me when I tell them that not a living human being, so far as I know, has ever approached any member of the Appropriations Committee to ask that anything be done to throw anything in the way of these investigations. Is there not every reason to think that your colleagues on the Appropriations Committee, on both sides of the aisle, are just as much interested in discovering pertinent facts with reference to fraud and corruption and graft in this country as you gentlemen are? I know I am. But this is not the question here.

We have a duty as the Appropriations Committee of the House. You have given us a duty as your committee, and that duty is to see that funds go where you vote them to go.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Not now. I have only 5 minutes, and I hope the gentleman will excuse me. Three gentlemen have spoken for the motion, and only my feeble words are against them.

All this section provides is that the money in this bill shall be used for these purposes. This does not stop any committee of Congress from getting information that it wants from any Government department.

It does not affect that in any way whatever. It does not stop any standing committee of Congress calling on any bureau to get any information it wants to be in a pertinent matter. What did our committee find out when we started into the Interstate Commerce Commission? We asked them why they had not done a certain job we had appropriated money for and they said they did not have the personnel to do it. Why? Because $400,000 of the money that Congress had appropriated for the Interstate Commerce Commission to look after the safety of employees on railroads and the other great work of that Commission, the regulation of motor-vehicle transportation, $400,000 of that money had been diverted and used in a committee investigation. All the Committee on Appropriations wants is this: If the Senate wants its own investigation, the Senate can get its money out of its contingent fund. It does not come out of the Appropriations Committee. If the House wants an investigation, the House can get the money from the Committee on Accounts, but the Committee on Appropriations asks you gentlemen in the interest of integrity and honesty of appropriations not to have us sitting on cases and appropriate money for a department and then have that department permit hundreds of thousands of dollars of that money to be diverted into other channels. Hundreds of thousands of dollars that you voted here to feed hungry men and women have been used for other purposes.

Mr. RANKIN. Oh, now!

Mr. WOODRUM. I cannot yield, but I am stating the fact. Hundreds of thousands of dollars of W. P. A. money was used in investigations. I am willing to stand with the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] and with other gentlemen and vote any needed sums for these investigations, but why are we to assume that the House and the Senate are not just as ready and willing to pursue these inquiries seriously and with needed funds as we would be to appropriate them in this bill? But, gentlemen, we do ask you as your committee to help us when we are trying to protect these Departments and insist that they use the money for the purposes for which you voted it out of your constituents' pockets. We ask you to back your Committee on Appropriations in this. This amendment was adopted in the independent offices appropriation bill, which is now in conference, and the two investigations that have been going on in the Senate have not been interfered with in any way. They have gone to the contingent fund of the Senate and have got their money and have pursued their investigations.

Mr. RANKIN. But did not the Senate strike it out of the other bill?

Mr. WOODRUM. The Senate struck it out, and it is in conference now, and we hope in the independent offices appropriation bill to find suitable language to cover the situation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken; and the Chair being in doubt, the Committee divided, and there were—ayes 39, noes 61.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Amendment offered by Mr. RAYBURN: Page 72, after line 13, add a new paragraph, as follows:

"SEC. 6. The unobligated balances on the date of the approval of this act of appropriations contained in the Legislative Branch Appropriation Act, 1937, for three positions in the office of the majority floor leader, House of Representatives, are hereby made available for four positions in such office at annual rates of compensation, respectively, as follows: Legislative clerk, $3,110; clerk, $2,530; and two assistant clerks, at $1,800 each."

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, there is no increase involved in this amendment, but I think that I can take four clerks instead of three and do better work for the House of Representatives than I can with three. That is the reason why I ask to be allowed to name four for the same amount of money for which I now name three.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill, with the amendments, to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GREENWOOD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 4720, the Treasury and Post Office Departments appropriation bill, 1938, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. LUDLOW, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SUPREME COURT

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, today the Farmer-Labor and Progressive conference, consisting of Members of this House belonging to those two parties, had a conference on the question of the President's message of February 5 proposing a reform of the Federal judiciary. At this meeting a statement was authorized to be made expressing the view of those who attended the conference.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting at this point the statement authorized by that conference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

The Farmer-Labor Progressive conference called by Chairman GARDNER R. WITHROW authorized the issuance of the following statement:

When Chief Justice Hughes was Governor of New York he said: "We are under a Constitution, but the Constitution is what the Judges say it is."

This statement is as true now as it was then. The fact that the present Justices of the Supreme Court have been divided in most of their opinions declaring acts of Congress unconstitutional should convince every fair-minded citizen that it is possible for the most intelligent, capable, and loyal jurists to differ in their interpretations of the constitutional provisions.

Without imputing improper motives to any members of the Court, we respectfully submit that if the Court had been composed of a majority of liberals rather than of conservatives, most of the acts of Congress which have been invalidated by the Supreme Court would have been upheld. Most of the Justices of the Supreme Court were appointed by conservative Presidents, largely because they, too, were conservatives. These Justices certainly have not become more progressive with advanced years. The Court has been "packed" with conservatives who have prevented Congress from effectively dealing with the complex problems of modern economic and social life. Equally able jurists, both on and off the Court, are of the opinion that in most instances the majority of the Court was wrong when it declared these acts of Congress unconstitutional.

Shall the people sit idly by and permit a Supreme Court that has been "packed" with ultraconservatives to tie its hands? It is necessary that we progress—that our Government meet the problems of the present day—that our constitutional form of government be saved. We cannot progress—the Government cannot function adequately—we endanger our form of government itself—unless we "unpack" the Supreme Court of the United States.

We cannot hope for immediate judicial reform through a constitutional amendment. Such procedure would require a two-thirds vote of each House of Congress and ratification by three-fourths of the States. Even though Congress should submit such a resolution for ratification, special privilege would use all its influence and resources to block favorable action on the part of the States. Thirteen States containing only 5 percent of the national population could prevent an amendment to the Constitution. We have seen that even in the case of the proposed child-labor amendment to the Constitution, with its great emotional appeal, approval of which has been urged by both a Republican and Democratic President, special privilege has succeeded in confusing the issue and preventing ratification. We cannot look in that direction for an effective means of solving our present problems.

The practical way to meet this great problem is to accept the recommendations which have been made by the President of the United States and thereby enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court by providing for additional and younger men to serve with those now on the Court, in the hope that the Constitution will then be interpreted in such a way as to meet the needs of the modern world. This would not do violence to the Constitution but it would do justice to the people whom the Constitution was intended to protect. The new appointees would take the same oath to defend and protect the Constitution—they would be men of unquestioned patriotism and devotion to duty. But they would be younger, more vigorous, and not so conservative as many of the men now on the Court.

We endorse the President's proposal and urge liberals to united action.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, Tuesday, by unanimous consent, is District day. I think the District Committee wants to consider several bills. Thursday of next week we shall either have no program or else there will be general debate on the naval appropriation bill. May I suggest, therefore, to the gentleman from Nebraska, that he wait until we see what the situation is on Tuesday? If the matters from the District Committee do not take up a great deal of time, he can speak later in the day. If not, I am sure there will be very liberal debate on the naval appropriation bill when it comes up.

Mr. BINDERUP. Mr. Speaker, I am very anxious to make my request comply to the rules of the House. I therefore withdraw my request.

SENATE

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Lord of all power and might, whose name is excellent in all the earth, whose glory is above the heavens, and who didst enable our forefathers to lay the strong foundations of peace, liberty, and safety for our Nation: Grant to us and to every citizen of the United States of America a devout sense of Thy signal mercies to our land, and increase in us a spirit of love and thankfulness to Thee, the author of all good, and a spirit of true devotion to the welfare of our country.

In imitation of him whose birthday we commemorate, help every member of our Government to hold his conscience higher than the praise of men, that his own righteous self-respect may suffice alike for motive and reward in the sphere of duty unto which he has been called. We ask it in the name of Him who is the great example to men and the hope of all nations, Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

READING OF WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under a standing order of the Senate, the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] having been designated to read the Farewell Address of George Washington, that Senator will now kindly advance to the desk and read the address.

Mr. LODGE advanced to the desk and said:

Mr. President, mindful as I have always been of the great traditions of the United States Senate, I deeply appreciate the honor of reading the immortal Farewell Address of George Washington.

Mr. LODGE then read the address, as follows:

To the people of the United States.

FRIENDS AND FELLOW CITIZENS: The period for a new election of a citizen to administer the executive government of the United States being not far distant, and the time actually arrived when your thoughts must be employed in designating the person who is to be clothed with that important trust, it appears to me proper, especially as it may conduce to a more distinct expression of the public voice, that I should now apprise you of the resolution I have formed, to decline being considered among the number of those, out of whom a choice is to be made.

I beg you, at the same time, to do me the justice to be assured, that this resolution has not been taken, without a strict regard to all the considerations appertaining to the relation which binds a dutiful citizen to his country; and that, in withdrawing the tender of service which silence in my situation might imply, I am influenced by no diminution of zeal for your future interest; no deficiency of grateful respect for your past kindness; but am supported by a full conviction that the step is compatible with both.

The acceptance of, and continuance hitherto in the office to which your suffrages have twice called me, have been a uniform sacrifice of inclination to the opinion of duty, and to a deference for what appeared to be your desire. I constantly hoped that it would have been much earlier in my power, consistently with motives which I was not at liberty to disregard, to return to that retirement from which I had been reluctantly drawn. The strength of my inclination to do this, previous to the last election, had even led to the preparation of an address to declare it to you; but mature reflection on the then perplexed and critical posture of our affairs with foreign nations, and the unanimous advice of persons entitled to my confidence, impelled me to abandon the idea.

I rejoice that the state of your concerns external as well as internal, no longer renders the pursuit of inclination incompatible with the sentiment of duty or propriety; and am persuaded, whatever partiality may be retained for my services, that in the present circumstances of our country, you will not disapprove my determination to retire.

The impressions with which I first undertook the arduous trust, were explained on the proper occasion. In the discharge of this trust, I will only say that I have, with good intentions, contributed towards the organization and administration of the government, the best exertions of which a very fallible judgment was capable. Not unconscious in the outset, of the inferiority of my qualifications, experience, in my own eyes, perhaps still more in the eyes of others, has strengthened the motives to diffidence of myself; and, every day, the increasing weight of years admonishes me more and more, that the shade of retirement is as necessary to me as it will be welcome. Satisfied that if any circumstances have given peculiar value to my services they were temporary, I have the consolation to believe that, while choice and prudence invite me to quit the political scene, patriotism does not forbid it.

In looking forward to the moment which is to terminate the career of my political life, my feelings do not permit me to suspend the deep acknowledgment of that debt of gratitude which I owe to my beloved country, for the many honors it has conferred upon me; still more for the steadfast confidence with which it has supported me; and for the opportunities I have thence enjoyed of manifesting my inviolable attachment, by services faithful and persevering, though in usefulness unequal to my zeal. If benefits have resulted to our country from these services, let it always be remembered to your praise, and as an instructive example in our annals, that under circumstances in which the passions, agitated in every direction, were liable to mislead amidst appearances sometimes dubious, vicissitudes of fortune often discouraging—in situations in which not unfrequently, want of success has countenanced the spirit of criticism,—the constancy of your support was the essential prop of the efforts, and a guarantee of the plans, by which they were effected. Profoundly penetrated with this idea, I shall carry it with me to my grave, as a strong incitement to unceasing vows that heaven may continue to you the choicest tokens of its beneficence—that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual—that the free constitution, which is the work of your hands, may be sacredly maintained—that its administration in every department may be stamped with wisdom and virtue—that, in fine, the happiness of the people of these states, under the auspices of liberty, may be made complete by so careful a preservation, and so prudent a use of this blessing, as will acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection and adoption of every nation which is yet a stranger to it.

Here, perhaps, I ought to stop. But a solicitude for your welfare, which cannot end but with my life, and the apprehension of danger, natural to that solicitude, urge me, on an occasion like the present, to offer to your solemn contemplation, and to recommend to your frequent review, some sentiments which are the result of much reflection, of no inconsiderable observation, and which appear to me all important to the permanency of your felicity as a people. These will be offered to you with the more freedom, as you can only see in them the disinterested warnings of a parting friend, who can possibly have no personal motive to bias his counsel. Nor can I forget, as an encouragement to it, your indulgent reception of my sentiments on a former and not dissimilar occasion.

Interwoven as is the love of liberty with every ligament of your hearts, no recommendation of mine is necessary to fortify or confirm the attachment.

The unity of government which constitutes you one people, is also now dear to you. It is justly so; for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence; the support of your tranquility at home; your peace abroad; of your safety; of your prosperity; of that very liberty which you so highly prize. But, as it is easy to foresee that, from different causes and from different quarters much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth; as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed; it is of infinite moment, that you should properly estimate the immense value of your national union to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it; accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as of the palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can, in any event, be abandoned; and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts.

For this you have every inducement of sympathy and interest. Citizens by birth, or choice, of a common country, that country has a right to concentrate your affections. The name of American, which belongs to you in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of patriotism, more than any appellation derived from local discriminations. With slight shades of difference, you have the same religion, manners, habits, and political principles. You have, in a common cause, fought and triumphed together; the independence and liberty you possess, are the work of joint counsels, and joint efforts, of common dangers, sufferings and successes.

But these considerations, however powerfully they address themselves to your sensibility, are greatly outweighed by those which apply more immediately to your interest.—Here, every portion of our country finds the most commanding motives for carefully guarding and preserving the union of the whole.

The north, in an unrestrained intercourse with the south, protected by the equal laws of a common government, finds in the productions of the latter, great additional resources of maritime and commercial enterprise, and precious materials of manufacturing industry.—The south, in the same intercourse, benefiting by the same agency of the north, sees its agriculture grow and its commerce expand. Turning partly into its own channels the seamen of the north, it finds its particular navigation invigorated; and while it contributes, in different ways, to nourish and increase the general mass of the national navigation, it looks forward to the protection of a maritime strength, to which itself is unequally adapted. The east, in a like intercourse with the west, already finds, and in the progressive improvement of interior communications by land and water, will more and more find a valuable vent for the commodities which it brings from abroad, or manufactures at home. The west derives from the east supplies requisite to its growth and comfort—and what is perhaps of still greater consequence, it must of necessity owe the secure enjoyment of indispensable outlets for its own productions, to the weight, influence, and the future maritime strength of the Atlantic side of the Union, directed by an indissoluble community of interest as one nation. Any other tenure by which the west can hold this essential advantage, whether derived from its own separate strength; or from an apostate and unnatural connection with any foreign power, must be intrinsically precarious.

While then every part of our country thus feels an immediate and particular interest in union, all the parts combined cannot fail to find in the united mass of means and efforts, greater strength, greater resource, proportionably greater security from external danger, a less frequent interruption of their peace by foreign nations; and, what is of inestimable value, they must derive from union, an exemption from those broils and wars between themselves, which so frequently afflict neighboring countries not tied together by the same government; which their own rivalship alone would be sufficient to produce, but which opposite foreign alliances, attachments, and intrigues, would stimulate and embitter.—Hence likewise, they will avoid the necessity of those overgrown military establishments, which under any form of government are inauspicious to liberty, and which are to be regarded as particularly hostile to republican liberty. In this sense it is, that your union ought to be considered as a main prop of your liberty, and that the love of the one ought to endear to you the preservation of the other.

These considerations speak a persuasive language to every reflecting and virtuous mind and exhibit the continuance of the union as a primary object of patriotic desire. Is there a doubt whether a common government can embrace so large a sphere? let experience solve it. To listen to mere speculation in such a case were criminal. We are authorized to hope that a proper organization of the whole, with the auxiliary agency of governments for the respective subdivisions, will afford a happy issue to the experiment. It is well worth a fair and full experiment. With such powerful and obvious motives to union, affecting all parts of our country, while experience shall not have demonstrated its impracticability, there will always be reason to distrust the patriotism of those who, in any quarter, may endeavor to weaken its hands.

In contemplating the causes which may disturb our Union, it occurs as matter of serious concern, that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by geographical discriminations,—northern and southern—Atlantic and western; whence designing men may endeavor to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of party to acquire influence within particular districts, is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You cannot shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heart burnings which spring from these misrepresentations: they tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection. The inhabitants of our western country have lately had a useful lesson on this head: they have seen, in the negotiation by the executive, and in the unanimous ratification by the senate of the treaty with Spain, and in the universal satisfaction at the event throughout the United States, a decisive proof how unfounded were the suspicions propagated among them of a policy in the general government and in the Atlantic states, unfriendly to their interests in regard to the Mississippi. They have been witnesses to the formation of two treaties, that with Great Britain and that with Spain, which secure to them everything they could desire in respect to our foreign relations, towards confirming their prosperity. Will it not be their wisdom to rely for the preservation of these advantages on the union by which they were procured? will they not henceforth be deaf to those advisers, if such they are, who would sever them from their brethren and connect them with aliens?

To the efficacy and permanency of your Union, a government for the whole is indispensable. No alliances, however strict, between the parts can be an adequate substitute; they must inevitably experience the infractions and interruptions which all alliances, in all times, have experienced. Sensible of this momentous truth, you have improved upon your first essay, by the adoption of a constitution of government, better calculated than your former, for an intimate union, and for the efficacious management of your common concerns. This government, the offspring of our own choice, uninfluenced and unawed, adopted upon full investigation and mature deliberation, completely free in its principles, in the distribution of its powers, uniting security with energy, and maintaining within itself a provision for its own amendment, has a just claim to your confidence and your support. Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government.—But the constitution which at any time exists, until changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all. The very idea of the power, and the right of the people to establish government, presuppose the duty of every individual to obey the established government.

All obstructions to the execution of the laws, all combinations and associations under whatever plausible character, with the real design to direct, control, counteract, or awe the regular deliberations and action of the constituted authorities, are destructive of this fundamental principle, and of fatal tendency.—They serve to organize faction, to give it an artificial and extraordinary force, to put in the place of the delegated will of the nation the will of party, often a small but artful and enterprising minority of the community; and, according to the alternate triumphs of different parties, to make the public administration the mirror of the ill concerted and incongruous projects of faction, rather than the organ of consistent and wholesome plans digested by common councils, and modified by mutual interests.

However combinations or associations of the above description may now and then answer popular ends, they are likely, in the course of time and things, to become potent engines, by which cunning, ambitious, and unprincipled men, will be enabled to subvert the power of the people, and to usurp for themselves the reins of government; destroying afterwards the very engines which have lifted them to unjust dominion.

Towards the preservation of your government and the permanency of your present happy state, it is requisite, not only that you steadily discountenance irregular opposition to its acknowledged authority, but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however spacious the pretext. One method of assault may be to effect, in the forms of the constitution, alterations which will impair the energy of the system; and thus to undermine what cannot be directly overthrown. In all the changes to which you may be invited, remember that time and habit are at least as necessary to fix the true character of governments, as of other human institutions:—that experience is the surest standard by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitution of a country:—that facility in changes, upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion, exposes to perpetual change from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion: and remember, especially, that for the efficient management of your common interests in a country so extensive as ours, a government of as much vigor as is consistent with the perfect security of liberty is indispensable. Liberty itself will find in such a government, with powers properly distributed and adjusted, its surest guardian. It is, indeed, little else than a name, where the government is too feeble to withstand the enterprises of faction, to confine each member of the society within the limits prescribed by the laws, and to maintain all in the secure and tranquil enjoyment of the rights of person and property.

I have already intimated to you the danger of parties in the state, with particular references to the founding them on geographical discrimination. Let me now take a more comprehensive view, and warn you in the most solemn manner against the baneful effects of the spirit of party generally.

This spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind.—It exists under different shapes in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed; but in those of the popular form it is seen in its greatest rankness, and is truly their worst enemy.

The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge natural to party dissension, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism.—But this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries which result, gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual; and, sooner or later, the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this disposition to the purpose of his own elevation on the ruins of public liberty.

Without looking forward to an extremity of this kind, (which nevertheless ought not to be entirely out of sight) the common and continual mischiefs of the spirit of party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it.

It serves always to distract the public councils, and enfeeble the public administration. It agitates the community with ill founded jealousies and false alarms; kindles the animosity of one part against another; foments occasional riot and insurrection. It opens the door to foreign influence and corruption, which finds a facilitated access to the government itself through the channels of party passions. Thus the policy and the will of one country are subjected to the policy and will of another.

There is an opinion that parties in free countries are useful checks upon the administration of the government, and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This within certain limits is probably true; and in governments of a monarchial cast, patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favor, upon the spirit of party. But in those of the popular character, in governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged. From their natural tendency, it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose. And there being constant danger of excess, the effort ought to be, by force of public opinion, to mitigate and assuage it. A fire not to be quenched, it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent it bursting into a flame, lest instead of warming, it should consume.

It is important likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration, to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department, to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominate in the human heart, is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasions of the others, has been evinced by experiments ancient and modern; some of them in our country and under our own eyes.—To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the constitution designates.—But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil, any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism, who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connections with private and public felicity. Let it simply be asked, where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? and let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect, that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle.

It is substantially true, that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government. The rule, indeed, extends with more or less force to every species of free government. Who that is a sincere friend to it can look with indifference upon attempts to shake the foundation of the fabric?

Promote, then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it should be enlightened.

As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible, avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering, also, that timely disbursements, to prepare for danger, frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it; avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions, in time of peace, to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars may have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burden which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your representatives, but it is necessary that public opinion should co-operate. To facilitate to them the performance of their duty, it is essential that you should practically bear in mind, that towards the payment of debts there must be revenue; that to have revenue there must be taxes; that no taxes can be devised which are not more or less inconvenient and unpleasant; that the intrinsic embarrassment inseparable from the selection of the proper object (which is always a choice of difficulties,) ought to be a decisive motive for a candid construction of the conduct of the government in making it, and for a spirit of acquiescence in the measures for obtaining revenue, which the public exigencies may at any time dictate.

Observe good faith and justice towards all nations; cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct, and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and, at no distant period, a great nation, to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt but, in the course of time and things, the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages which might be lost by a steady adherence to it; can it be that Providence has not connected the permanent felicity of a nation with its virtue? The experiment, at least, is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature. Alas! is it rendered impossible by its vices?

In the execution of such a plan, nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others, should be excluded; and that, in place of them, just and amicable feelings towards all should be cultivated. The nation which indulges towards another an habitual hatred, or an habitual fondness, is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. Antipathy in one nation against another disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur. Hence, frequent collisions, obstinate, envenomed, and bloody contests. The nation, prompted by ill will and resentment, sometimes impels to war the government, contrary to the best calculations of policy. The government sometimes participates in the national propensity, and adopts through passion what reason would reject; at other times, it makes the animosity of the nation subservient to projects of hostility, instigated by pride, ambition, and other sinister and pernicious motives. The peace often, sometimes perhaps the liberty of nations, has been the victim.

So likewise, a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest, in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter, without adequate inducements or justifications. It leads also to concessions, to the favorite nation, of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions, by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained, and by exciting jealousy, ill will, and a disposition to retaliate in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld; and it gives to ambitious, corrupted or deluded citizens who devote themselves to the favorite nation, facility to betray or sacrifice the interests of their own country, without odium, sometimes even with popularity; gilding with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation, a commendable deference for public opinion, or a laudable zeal for public good, the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption, or infatuation.

As avenues to foreign influence in innumerable ways, such attachments are particularly alarming to the truly enlightened and independent patriot. How many opportunities do they afford to tamper with domestic factions, to practice the arts of seduction, to mislead public opinion, to influence or awe the public councils!—Such an attachment of a small or weak, towards a great and powerful nation, dooms the former to be the satellite of the latter.

Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence, (I conjure you to believe me fellow citizens,) the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake; since history and experience prove, that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial, else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defense against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike for another, cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side, and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other. Real patriots, who may resist the intrigues of the favorite, are liable to become suspected and odious; while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people, to surrender their interests.

The great rule of conduct for us, in regard to foreign nations, is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith:—Here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests, which to us have none, or a very remote relation. Hence, she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves by artificial ties, in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon, to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation, when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?

It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliance with any portion of the foreign world; so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it; for let me not be understood as capable of patronizing infidelity to existing engagements. I hold the maxim no less applicable to public than private affairs, that honesty is always the best policy. I repeat it, therefore, let those engagements be observed in their genuine sense. But in my opinion, it is unnecessary, and would be unwise to extend them.

Taking care always to keep ourselves by suitable establishments, on a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

Harmony, and a liberal intercourse with all nations, are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand; neither seeking nor granting exclusive favors or preferences; consulting the natural course of things; diffusing and diversifying by gentle means the streams of commerce, but forcing nothing; establishing with powers so disposed, in order to give trade a stable course, to define the rights of our merchants, and to enable the government to support them, conventional rules of intercourse, the best that present circumstances and mutual opinion will permit, but temporary, and liable to be from time to time abandoned or varied as experience and circumstances shall dictate; constantly keeping in view, that it is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another; that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character; that by such acceptance, it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favors, and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more. There can be no greater error than to expect, or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation. It is an illusion which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard.

In offering to you, my countrymen, these counsels of an old and affectionate friend, I dare not hope they will make the strong and lasting impression I could wish; that they will control the usual current of the passions, or prevent our nation from running the course which has hitherto marked the destiny of nations, but if I may even flatter myself that they may be productive of some partial benefit, some occasional good; that they may now and then recur to moderate the fury of party spirit, to warn against the mischiefs of foreign intrigue, to guard against the impostures of pretended patriotism, this hope will be a full recompense for the solicitude for your welfare by which they have been dictated.

How far, in the discharge of my official duties, I have been guided by the principles which have been delineated, the public records and other evidences of my conduct must witness to you and to the world. To myself, the assurance of my own conscience is, that I have, at least believed myself to be guided by them.

In relation to the still subsisting war in Europe; my proclamation of the 22d of April, 1793, is the index to my plan. Sanctioned by your approving voice, and by that of your representatives in both houses of congress, the spirit of that measure has continually governed me, uninfluenced by any attempts to deter or divert me from it.

After deliberate examination, with the aid of the best lights I could obtain, I was well satisfied that our country, under all the circumstances of the case, had a right to take, and was bound, in duty and interest, to take a neutral position. Having taken it, I determined, as far as should depend upon me, to maintain it with moderation, perseverance and firmness.

The considerations which respect the right to hold this conduct, it is not necessary on this occasion to detail. I will only observe that, according to my understanding of the matter, that right, so far from being denied by any of the belligerent powers, has been virtually admitted by all.

The duty of holding a neutral conduct may be inferred, without any thing more, from the obligation which justice and humanity impose on every nation, in cases in which it is free to act, to maintain inviolate the relations of peace and amity towards other nations.

The inducements of interest for observing that conduct will best be referred to your own reflections and experience. With me, a predominant motive has been to endeavor to gain time to our country to settle and mature its yet recent institutions, and to progress, without interruption, to that degree of strength, and consistency which is necessary to give it, humanly speaking, the command of its own fortunes.

Though in reviewing the incidents of my administration, I am unconscious of intentional error, I am nevertheless too sensible of my defects not to think it probable that I may have committed many errors. What ever they may be, I fervently beseech the Almighty to avert or mitigate the evils to which they may tend. I shall also carry with me the hope that my country will never cease to view them with indulgence; and that, after forty-five years of my life dedicated to its service, with an upright zeal, the faults of incompetent abilities will be consigned to oblivion, as myself must soon be to the mansions of rest.

Relying on its kindness in this as in other things, and actuated by that fervent love towards it, which is so natural to a man who views in it the native soil of himself and his progenitors for several generations; I anticipate with pleasing expectation that retreat in which I promise myself to realize, without alloy, the sweet enjoyment of partaking, in the midst of my fellow citizens, the benign influence of good laws under a free government—the ever favorite object of my heart, and the happy reward, as I trust, of our mutual cares, labors and dangers.

GEO. WASHINGTON

UNITED STATES,
17th September, 1796.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACHMAN in the chair). The Chair, on behalf of the Senate, desires to thank the junior Senator from Massachusetts for his splendid rendition of Washington's Farewell Address.

REASONS FOR AND MEANING OF THE FAREWELL ADDRESS

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, the reading of Washington's Farewell Address on his birthday is a Senate custom which the country highly approves. It is a mark of respect due the Father of his Country. This custom began in the eighties of the last century. Through the nineties, year after year, Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, submitted a resolution providing that the address be read. On January 24, 1901, he changed his resolution to read as follows:

Ordered, That, unless otherwise directed, on the 22d day of February in each year, * * * Washington's Farewell Address shall be read in the Senate by a Senator to be designated for the purpose by the presiding officer * * *. (Senate Journal, 103, 56–2, Jan. 24, 1901.)

Since the standing order was adopted, the Farewell Address has been read alternately by a Democrat and Republican each year.

Laudable as the reading of the address is, it may become a perfunctory practice or it may result in an adherence to one-sided or at least sloganized deductions if we do not from time to time rehearse the real meaning of the address and the reasons for which it was written.

Washington's Farewell Address was not merely advice for future generations prepared by our great first President without consultation, nor was it without partisan political significance. Great as the address is, and important as it has become, it was a defense of his administration quite as much as an exposition of wisdom and virtue. Washington's wisdom and virtue may be accepted as universal, but his defense must not be separated from his time. The address did not receive unanimous approval. The opponents to his administration saw in it only partisan motives. This is historical fact, not a reflection upon Washington.

A great compliment that can be paid to General Washington was that he took advice. Woodrow Wilson writes:

* * * General Washington * * * set an example which few of his successors seem to have followed * * *. He made constant and intimate use of his colleagues in every matter that he handled, seeking their assistance and advice by letter when they were at a distance * * *. It is well known * * * that his greater state papers * * * are full of the ideas and the very phrases of the men about him whom he most trusted. His rough drafts came back to him from Mr. Hamilton and Mr. Madison in great part rephrased and rewritten, in many passages reconceived and given a new color. * * * (The President of the United States, by Woodrow Wilson, pp. 67 and 68.)

Professor Beard pictures the background and the address thus:

This state of affairs confirmed Washington in his determination to retire * * *. He was weary from his burdensome labors in field and forum. * * * Once he had received respectful homage on all occasions; now, near the close of his second administration, he was shocked and grieved to find himself spattered with the mud of political criticism. Having definitely alined himself with the Federalist group, * * * he had voluntarily incurred the risks of partisan attacks. Nevertheless, he was distressed beyond measure to hear himself assailed, as he complained, "in such exaggerated and indecent terms as could scarcely be applied to a Nero, a notorious defaulter, or even to a common pickpocket." * * * In September 1796, on the eve of the Presidential election, he announced his decision in a Farewell Address that is now among the treasured state papers of the American Nation.

In this note of affection and warning to his fellow citizens, Washington directed their attention especially to three subjects of vital interest. Having dimly sensed the conflict impending between the North and the South, he gravely cautioned them against sectional jealousies. Having suffered from the excesses of factional strife, he warned them against the extremes of partisanship. * * * Having observed the turbulent influence of foreign affairs upon domestic politics, he put them on their guard against "permanent alliances, * * * artificial entanglements, * * * (and) the insidious wiles of alien intrigues."

Then in simple words of reconciliation he expressed the hope that his country would forgive the mistakes which he had committed during his 45 years of public life, and that he might enjoy, in the midst of his countrymen, "the benign influence of good laws under a free government—the ever favorite object of my heart, and the happy reward, as I trust, of our mutual cares, labors, and dangers." (The Rise of American Civilization, by Charles A. Beard and Mary R. Beard, pp. 371, 372.)

Professor Nevins writes:

Earnestly desiring leisure, feeling a decline of his physical powers, and wincing under opposition abuse, Washington refused to yield to the general pressure for a third term. This refusal was blended with a testament of sagacious advice to his country in the Farewell Address of September 19, 1796, written largely by Hamilton but remolded by Washington and expressing his ideas. (Biography of George Washington (Retirement), by Allan Nevins.)

Professor Philbrick, in writing of Alexander Hamilton, has this to say:

His activity in the Cabinet was by no means confined to the finances. * * * It is often said that Hamilton's counsels were predominant with Washington. In domestic affairs this is, on the whole, true * * *. With regard to foreign relations, common sense and better judgment usually supported Jefferson's counsels—but where those qualities were involved Washington needed no counsel. Neutrality and isolation were American policies (to be found in the letters of every public man) before any occasion arose for their official promulgation. There was here no real difference between Hamilton and Jefferson—one sympathized with England, the other with France, but both desired neutrality. * * * In January 1795 Hamilton resigned and returned to the practice of law in New York * * *. But though in private life he remained the continual and chief adviser of Washington, * * * Washington's Farewell Address cannot fairly be said to have been "written" by Hamilton; for Washington had worked upon it for years, and Madison had contributed to it. But though Washington supplied what he called the "body" to Hamilton, the latter apparently largely re-dressed it; and in particular he added what he described as "such reflections and sentiments as will wear well, * * * and redound to future reputation." (Biography of Alexander Hamilton, appearing in the Encyclopaedia Britannica, author, Francis S. Philbrick.)

From the above and other sources we know that early in 1796 Washington began his valedictory. This constituted the first draft, which was sent to Hamilton. Hamilton made a digest known as Abstract of Points to Form an Address. From this digest, Hamilton began what he called a major draft, and as a result of correspondence the major draft passed back and forth between Washington and Hamilton, and by revision and extension was considerably amended. After Hamilton had completed this major draft and had sent it to Washington, he made another draft known as the "draft for incorporating", meaning that Washington might choose either the major draft as material for consideration, or incorporate the other draft with Washington's first one. Washington then began the preparation in his own hand of a manuscript for the printer, known as his own "final manuscript", from the material furnished him by Hamilton.

After Washington died, and down through the years, sentences and paragraphs from Washington's address have been pounced upon and quoted as Scripture to serve a purpose at a given time or a given place. In a year like the present, when neutrality is on the minds of all, Washington's defense of his own neutrality acts may be used to justify or to condemn a neutrality stand of the present. This is hardly fair. It is the world of today that we must legislate for; not the world as it was in Washington's day. If the address is used for argument today, it is the spirit of the whole that should guide us and not a single phrase or paragraph. The reading of all the related paragraphs to the defense of his neutrality policy proves that he did not conceive conditions to remain as they were, nor did he assume future policy necessarily to be identical with his. His reference to neutrality comes in justification of his proclamation of the 22d of April 1793 and the subsequent legislation. His stand on neutrality referred definitely and particularly to what had been done. Note his words:

After deliberate examination, with the aid of the best lights I could obtain, I was well satisfied that our country, under all the circumstances of the case, had a right to take, and was bound, in duty and interest, to take a neutral position. Having taken it, I determined, as far as should depend upon me, to maintain it with moderation, perseverance, and firmness.

* * * * * * *

Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence (I conjure you to believe me, fellow citizens), the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake; since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. * * * Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike for another cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side, and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other.

Thus from experiences which were his own came the following general principles:

The great rule of conduct for us, in regard to foreign nations, is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith. Here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests, which to us have none, or a very remote relation. * * *

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient Government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation, when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Running through the whole of the address we discover the elements of growth, as expressed above in the words "the period is not far off." We note also his desire for constitutional change only by peaceful process, and the theory that the time may come when our strength may be sufficient to withstand all threats to our peace. Thus one reason for our neutrality then was a necessary one due to our weakness.

Washington, with the wisdom of a prophet, foresaw that an adherence to the policies of fair dealing and honesty would bring its reward to the Nation just as it does to the individual. Nowhere in Washington's writings do we find the assumption that conditions are static. It would be impossible for him to have accepted that philosophy when we understand the theories of his time in regard to the concept of progress. The fathers of our country were influenced in their philosophical outlook by the theory of progress which broke upon the European and American world like a new renaissance after certain contacts with an older civilization. Condorcet and the Encyclopédistes had caught the spirit of progress. Washington, Jefferson, and our whole early governmental processes reflect it. Without the idea of progress could our Government have adopted the motto for its great seal, "Annuit Coeptis. Novus Ordo Seclorum"?

Chief Justice Jay, in his decision in Chisholm v. Georgia (2 Dall. 419), lays down the doctrine that a new order of legal processes was set up under the Constitution which was a break with the past. Jay carried the idea too far, because, of course, there can be no break with the past. The people soon overcame the legal consequences of Jay's decision by adopting the eleventh amendment.

The following quotation from Jefferson also reflects the spirit of progress of the time:

* * * I shall not die without a hope that light and liberty are on steady advance. We have seen, indeed, once within the records of history a complete eclipse of the human mind continuing for centuries. * * * And even should the cloud of barbarism and despotism again obscure the science and liberties of Europe, this country remains to preserve and restore light and liberty to them. In short, the flames kindled on the 4th of July 1776 have spread over too much of the globe to be extinguished by the feeble engines of despotism; on the contrary, they will consume these engines and all who work them. (Jefferson's letter to John Adams, Sept. 12, 1821.)

Washington's idea was one of change resulting in growth and development for he had already written:

* * * as the member of an infant empire * * * and as a citizen of the great republic of humanity at large, I cannot help turning my attention sometimes to this subject. I would be understood to mean I cannot avoid reflecting with pleasure on the probable influence that commerce may hereafter have on human manners and society in general. On these occasions I consider how mankind may be connected, like one great family, in fraternal ties. I indulge a fond, perhaps an enthusiastic, idea that, as the world is evidently much less barbarous than it has been, its amelioration must still be progressive; that nations are becoming more humanized in their policy; that the subjects of ambition and causes for hostility are daily diminishing; and in fine that the period is not very remote when the benefits of a liberal and friendly commerce will pretty generally succeed to the devastation and horrors of war. (Washington's letter to Lafayette, Aug. 15, 1786.)

Students of the history of ideas know where Washington got the phrase "one great family, in fraternal ties."

As these ideas continued to evolve in his mind, he conceived of a changing and more refined justification of war, for he wrote that the resort to war can be justified only on the score of maintenance of self-respect. Thus, by 1795, he believed—

It is well known that peace (to borrow a modern phrase) has been the order of the day with me since the disturbance in Europe first commenced. My policy has been, and will continue, while I have the honor to remain in the administration of the Government, to be upon friendly terms with, but independent of, all nations of the earth; to fulfill our own engagements; to supply the wants and be carrier for them all; being thoroughly convinced that it is our policy and interest to do so. Nothing short of self-respect, and that justice which is essential to a national character, ought to involve us in war. (Washington's letter to Gouverneur Morris, Dec. 22, 1795.)

If we do not consider a man's life, his writings, and his aspirations as a whole, but consider them only in minute detail, and if we draw deductions from those details, we may find a mass of contradictions and end in an argument over petty deductions. Thus, in spite of all that Washington advised against alliance (and the alliance principle was the international curse of his time, as it is of ours), Washington said this:

At present everything in America is tranquil, and I hope will long remain so. It is not our interest to seek new broils, and I hope our neighbors will not commence them. * * * I never expect to draw my sword again; I can scarcely conceive the cause that would induce me to do it. But if, contrary to all expectations, such an event should take place, I should think it a fortunate circumstance, and myself highly honored, to have it supported by yours. * * * My first wish is * * * to see the whole world in peace, and the inhabitants of it as one band of brothers striving who should contribute most to the happiness of mankind. (Washington's letter to the Marquis de la Rouerie, Oct. 7, 1785.)

Here, again, we may refer to the prophetic Washington. He did look into the future, as anyone who has accepted Condorcet's theory of progress must; and if he could have seen this day, he would not see the whole world in peace, but he would see a group made up of many nations "striving to contribute most to the happiness of mankind", and he would see his own country cooperating with most of the nations of the world, or with citizens of most of the world's nations, in international problems "striving to contribute most to the happiness of mankind." Washington's dream of the nations working together has in a sense been fulfilled. His own country participates officially in at least six forms of what we may call permanent international cooperation, and in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, the United States took part in more than 50 international conferences and congresses. During the same year America participated in five international expositions and celebrations and associated itself with about 15 permanent international commissions, committees, institutes, tribunals, and similar organizations. During the same year the United States participated in more than 15 permanent international bureaus, unions, and similar organizations. The United States now is a party to treaties of conciliation with more than 35 countries. Likewise, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, the United States functioned through five special arbitration tribunals of limited duration. The above international undertakings are all outside our regular Diplomatic and Consular Services.

Was Washington thinking only of the Thirteen States when he wrote the following? Probably so; I do not know. But the program which he conceived for the future welfare of the Thirteen States is in spirit a program which we might conceive as broad enough for the future welfare of all States. Washington's program was:

First. * * * Union of the States under one Federal head;
Second. A sacred regard to public justice;
Third. The adoption of a proper peace establishment; and Fourth. The prevalence of that pacific and friendly disposition among the people of the United States, which will induce them to forget their local prejudices and policies; to make those mutual concessions, which are requisite to the general prosperity; and, in some instances, to sacrifice their individual advantages to the interest of the community. (Washington's Legacy, addressed to the Governors of all the States on the disbanding of the Army from his headquarters at Newburgh, N. Y., on June 8, 1783.)

To the extent that we in America have followed Washington's four principles we have succeeded in becoming what we are. To the extent that the world as a whole will adopt those principles, the people of the world may enjoy peace and orderly intercourse. It is the idea which I would stress. For no one in the world today would advocate a world-wide super state. But the rest of the program has universal application.

And thus Washington dreamed. But no dream can equal the real march of America. Even Condorcet could not envision progress equal to this simple retelling of actual history:

Under heaven Columbus sailed and a new world was found. Here men of common hope from many climes made homes. These men, nurtured in freedom, brought to the New World tried and lasting ideals of the old, and when the motherland failed to cherish the best of its own, a clash occurred. This Jefferson justified and made purposeful by the Declaration of Independence (1776). Led by Washington, patriots put down the mighty, and those of low degree sought safety in law. Blessed by peace, but not yet one in purpose, the fathers of the new nation covenanted for a more perfect union. They proposed a government to bring justice to life and liberty in pursuit of happiness. Thus 13 States became one and democracy was given birth. Citizens, guided by a President, spoke their will through Congress, and that they might never lose their rights through the force of the past or the will of the dead, and that the letter of the law might not kill but its spirit live, a supreme court was established, and thereby the Constitution of the United States became a living oracle, fitting past purposes to present needs and freeing the minds of men from fear of the future (1789). Loosed from powers that dull and thwart, the people, inspired with justice, caused the newly founded democracy to fill the vacant places. Imbued with zeal to make sleeping nature serve and the desert blossom as the rose, they pressed on that many might earn blessings formerly garnered only by the few. Onward and upward and ever forward they advanced, unashamed to pray, willing to die, happy in planting that men might eat. Urged to use, bent on building, they never once turned back. Moving westward, by purchase, they added vast Louisiana (1803). Next, south, they won by cession the Floridas (1819). Then into Texas they went, which, by annexation, became part of the Union (1845). By agreement with neighbors on the north, Oregon was divided, bringing lasting peace to a long boundary (1846). After strife a sister nation to the south ceded and sold Mexican soil (1848). To this mighty country, rich in plenty and secure in law, many thousands came to enjoy her benefits and admire her greatness. They built a nation of free men, a nation of thoughtful women, a nation of forward-looking children, where each, equal before the law, is master of himself but servant to all; where the majority rule, but the minority are protected; where kings may pause to see justice done, but where no king shall ever reign. This land, where men are responsible and restrained but free to think, to come, to go, and to do—so great in territory, so noble in tradition—nevertheless fought with itself, and under Lincoln men gave their all that the government of the people, by the people, and for the people should not perish from the earth. Wounds healed, the people again made one, no longer is there North and no longer is there South. With new faith in old purposes, Alaska was purchased, removing despotic rule from America (1867). To surround the land by a single sea, Roosevelt built the Panama Canal, which united a nation by dividing a continent (1904). No longer are the waters of the earth separate. No longer is there East and no longer is there West. For God hath wrought that men may have joy and in this land of promise gain life abundant. Then a strife-maddened earth called democracy to its assistance. Men died that war might be no more. Victory gained, Wilson proposed and nations set up institutions for peace and legal process (1919). The path of peace is not assured, but the way to peace is in the earth.

Thus Washington's dream of "one great family in fraternal ties" and of himself "a citizen of the great republic of humanity at large" is today democracy's promise for the future.

With this broad introduction, I shall turn to an incident which occurred on this floor 2 years ago today. Our great friend and neighbor, the dean of this body, whom every Senator respects and whom I honor, arose in the Senate and delivered as strong and as powerful an oration of a dozen lines as I have ever heard. The Senator impressively spoke the following:

It is clear to me, Mr. President, that this statement attributed to George Washington is a crude, clumsy, impudent forgery. It carries the brand of criminal falsehood upon its face. In style, in manner of expression, in substance, and in thought it is manifestly a weak but vicious pretense.

Even had Washington entertained such an opinion, he would not have expressed it in such feeble and impotent terms.

It was forged for a purpose; that purpose was to plant in our historic literature a view contrary to all views expressed and opinions entertained by the Father of his Country. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 74th Cong., 1st sess., Feb. 22, 1935, p. 2538.)

That which furnished the stimulus for the Senator's remarks was a Washington Post editorial of January 12, 1934, attributing the following to the Father of his Country:

* * * That Washington foresaw a future "when our institutions being firmly consolidated and working with complete success, we might safely and perhaps beneficially take part in the consultations held by foreign states for the advantage of the nations."

Those were the words which were pronounced a forgery. The Washington Post apologized in the following words, which I quote, because the Post appreciated and described the painstaking research which the Senator concluded before he reached his decision:

The Post owes an apology to Senator BORAH and is glad to make it without reservation. Indeed, the sting to editorial pride is greatly softened by whole-souled admiration for the Senator's course of conduct in the incident. It has taken more than a year for Mr. BORAH to bring us to book, but while he has ground slowly in the matter, he has also ground exceeding small.

Over a year ago, on January 12, 1934, we printed an editorial in which we suggested that advocates of isolation should look further than the Farewell Address in quoting from George Washington, and should consider also his anticipation (as we said) of a time "when, our institutions being firmly consolidated and working with complete success, we might safely and, perhaps, beneficially, take part in the consultations held by foreign states for the advantage of the nations." The editorial containing this quotation was pointed at a speech which Senator BORAH had just made in New York.

The quotation attributed to Washington we took from Prof. George H. Blakeslee's book on the Recent Foreign Policy of the United States (the Abingdon Press, 1925). Knowing the outstanding scholastic reputation of Dr. Blakeslee, who has handled several special assignments for the Department of State in addition to his academic achievements, we relied upon his authority. Not so Senator BORAH, who, as he said on the floor of the Senate on Friday, "began an investigation to find when and where Washington used the language attributed to him above."

The Senator's researches stand out as a model to which many less busy public figures, not excluding Professor Blakeslee, might properly address themselves. Mr. BORAH first took the matter up with the legislative reference service, which could not find the source but told him of its quotation by Professor Blakeslee. Correspondence with the professor followed. He stated that his source was not the papers of George Washington but an article by Dr. Horace M. Kallen, published in the Journal of International Relations in October 1921.

Correspondence with Professor Kallen, at the New School for Social Research, in New York, then failed to develop any evidence of the original source of the attributed quotation. But to satisfy himself completely on the spurious character of the statement, the Senator wrote to other authorities, including the secretary of the American Historical Society, receiving in every case the conclusion that Washington never said what Professor Kallen, Professor Blakeslee, and, in turn, ourselves, assumed he said.

There can be nothing but admiration for the painstaking and irrefutable manner in which Senator BORAH has developed the evidence of forgery in this matter. And the fact that we prompted his investigations remains as a certain compensation for having unwittingly made a link in a chain of misstatement of very curious and thought-provoking origin.

The editorials and the strong statement attracted my attention. The spirit of the words attributed to Washington seemed in harmony with the ideas of Washington's time when I thought of the dawning of the concept of progress. To me the words did not seem contrary to what Washington might have said. If they were a forgery, I realized that the spurious origin of this idea had done violence to many of those thoughtful in America, and I became interested to see if I could find their origin. I was not interested in finding someone wrong. As a teacher of historical method, that emotion left me long ago. A desire for the truth was my aim. Those of us, of course, who feel that the future welfare of the world lies in the road of conciliation, cooperation, arbitration, and peaceful adjustment rather than in fear and distrust, with their resultant dependence on force, would like to have seen such sentiments expressed by the Father of his Country. Washington's outstanding characteristic was that of honesty; and if our faith in him is not grounded on honesty and truth, that faith is vainly placed.

With all of the aids that the Senator from Idaho taught me were at my disposal, I started an investigation, using the same aids. Curiosity, though, drove me to use my own methods. These are the results:

Nowhere in Washington's writings have we found those words. If he ever uttered the sentiments, they came to the first user of the words by tradition and hearsay. The words are old in our political literature. They have been used by men recognized as of competent authority. They have been used in more than one place and one time and by persons representing different groups of thought. They first came into our political literature in 1863, and were first used by Secretary of State William H. Seward in relation to a controversy existing at that time.

Mr. Seward, in writing to Mr. Dayton, United States Minister to France, used them thus:

It is true that Washington thought a time might come when, our institutions being firmly consolidated and working with complete success, we might safely and perhaps beneficially take part in the consultations held by foreign states for the common advantage of the nations. (Diplomatic correspondence, 1863, I, 667; Moore, Digest of International Law, VI, 23.)

Seward did not use quotation marks, and it is of interest that the words were used by him in relation to a controversy which arose at the time of our Civil War. The circumstances under which Seward wrote were these: France was contemplating using moral influence with the Emperor of Russia respecting the harsh treatment by the Emperor of his rebellious subjects, the Poles. France extended an invitation to the United States to associate itself with this movement, which had already been joined by several European powers. In Mr. Seward's letter of instruction to the French Minister Mr. Seward used the above words, and then stated that it was impossible for the United States to join in the movement, one ground being that such intervention in Russia might afford grounds for a precedent of intervention in our own Civil War by European powers. Seward implies that in spite of Washington's ideas to the contrary, America would not join with France and her associates in united action. This implication leaves us with the thought that the idea was a common one, or had at least been suggested by Mr. Dayton.

Mr. Seward was, of course, a leader of the great Republican Party during its years of infancy and was Lincoln's trusted adviser during the Civil War. Having found the words used by Mr. Seward, we became more fascinated with the search, and naturally turned to other writings of Seward to see if we could find the origin of the words. In this we failed, but we did find reference to the idea.

In March 1852, when Mr. Seward was a Senator of the United States, and after sentiment in our country had arisen in behalf of Hungary in her troubles with Russia, Mr. Seward introduced in the Senate the following resolution:

Resolved, That, considering that the people of Hungary, in the exercise of the right secured to them by the laws of nations, * * * asserted their national independence, * * * and that the Emperor of Russia, without just or lawful right, invaded Hungary, * * * and thereby reduced that country to the condition of a province ruled by a foreign power; the United States, in defense of their own interests, and of the common interests of mankind, do solemnly protest against the conduct of Russia on that occasion * * *; and the United States do further declare that they will not hereafter be indifferent to similar acts of national injustice * * * wherever they occur.

During the debate in favor of this resolution Mr. Seward uttered the following words on March 9, 1852:

There remains the objection, that flows so readily from all conservative pens and tongues on this side of the Atlantic, and still more freely from the stipendiary presses of Paris and Vienna, that a protest would be a departure from the traditional policy of our country, and from the precepts of Washington * * *.

What irony of ironies! Seward credits the foreign papers of Paris and Vienna with using Washington's Farewell Address in keeping the United States from doing what Paris and Vienna did not want her to do. It is a shame that Seward did not point to these facts as "insidious wiles of foreign influence." It is indeed strange that historians have not pointed out that in the campaigns for entrance into the League of Nations and adherence to the World Court protocols great foreign blocs among our naturalized citizens led in the opposition and, like the Paris and Vienna press of 1852, used the American traditional policy taken from the precepts of Washington as their reason. This was no more their real reason in 1919, 1926, and 1934 than it was the real reason of the French and Austrian press in 1852.

Sir, granting for a moment that Washington inculcated just such a policy as is claimed by my opponents, is it so entirely certain that it ought always and under all circumstances be pursued? * * *

I hope it will not now be thought presumptuous on my part or irreverent to the memory of Washington or dangerous to the State if I inquire on what principle the duty of neutrality was founded by that illustrious man, and whether he enjoined that policy as one of absolute and perpetual obligation?

In this same Senate address we find, in Seward's explanation of Washington's defense of his neutrality policy in the Farewell Address, the thought which was later clothed in the words under discussion:

"The duty of holding a neutral conduct", said he in his Farewell Address, "may be inferred without anything more from the obligation which justice and humanity impose on every nation, in cases in which it is free to act to maintain inviolate the relations of peace and amity toward other nations."

Our "freedom", in that case, resulted from the circumstances which excused us from cooperating with France, notwithstanding our treaty of alliance; and the exercise of "justice and humanity" was in favor of our own people.

"The inducements of interest for observing that conduct", said he, "will best be referred to your own reflections and experience. With me a predominate motive has been to endeavor to gain time to settle and mature its yet recent institutions and to progress without interruption to that degree of strength and constancy which is necessary to give it, humanly speaking, the command of its own fortunes." (The Works of William H. Seward, edited by George E Baker (new edition, 5 vols., Boston, 1884), vol. I, pp. 196, 206, 218–219.)

Thus we see a chain of thought. When Seward wrote his letter of May 11, 1863, to Mr. Dayton he seems to have put into words an idea he had carried in his mind for 11 years. On this supposition Seward's assertion of what Washington thought was based not on a saying of Washington but on Seward's own inference that if Washington in his Farewell Address based his recommendation of neutrality on conditions existing at the time, when conditions had changed Washington would have given different advice. There is a strong similarity between Seward's words in 1863 and his interpretation of Washington's Farewell Address in 1852. From Seward these words found their way into Wharton's International Law Digest and are therein printed on page 182 of volume I.

In the Atlantic Monthly of May 1898 there appears an article by Richard Olney entitled "International Isolation of the United States", which had been first delivered as an address at Sanders Theatre, Harvard University, March 2, 1898. Olney was Secretary of State under Grover Cleveland. In his article he used the identical words used by Seward, placed them in quotation marks, and prefaced them with the introductory remark:

There is authority of the highest character for the statement that he (Washington) entertained an exactly opposite view and thought a time might come—

And so forth.

This "highest authority" undoubtedly referred to Seward, and it is from Olney's speech, or from Wharton's International Law Digest, or later, Moore's Digest of International Law, that the quotation became current, especially since the turn of the century, and from that time on it has been quite commonly used, and it has been commonly assumed as being authoritative.

In our search for the source of the controversial quotation we found that Secretary Olney, in his speech in 1898, used another quotation from Washington:

We at this great distance from the northern parts of Europe hear of wars and rumors of wars as if they were the events or reports of another planet.

Believing that if we could locate this other quotation we might have a key to the discovery of the first, we commenced a search for the second one. This we found. It appears in a letter dated April 29, 1790, written to Marquis de la Luzerne, Minister of France to London. The letter is in the handwriting of David Humphreys, Washington's secretary, but is signed by Washington. We have a photostatic copy from the files of the State Department. It is a mere deduction, but if a former Secretary of State, who had an opportunity to get near original sources used an original source which was not commonly current, was it wrong to surmise that probably Olney's "highest authority" was from a source even older than Seward? I have made this assumption in spite of the fact that Mr. Putnam, the present Librarian of Congress, and then librarian of the Public Library of Boston, apparently at Secretary Olney's request, was unable to find the original source of the quotation used by Olney. Mr. Putnam's letter to Olney, dated March 9, 1898, only 1 week after the delivery of the address by Olney, reports a fruitless search for the source beyond Seward. In any event, Olney accepted the theory of the quotation, and, therefore, probably convinced himself of its genuineness. This is proved quite strikingly from a preliminary draft of Olney's 1898 speech, which is still in existence, where he said:

He, on the contrary, distinctly declared that the time would come—

And so forth.

This preliminary draft was discovered through the research of Dr. Denys P. Myers, who writes:

Mr. Olney constantly made drafts and revisions of any paper which was incubating in his mind. The address of March 2, 1898, was under preparation from some time in 1897, the year when he ceased to be Secretary of State. None of his longhand drafts exist, but two typewritten drafts do. The earlier of these is undated, but must have been typed by the first week of February 1898.

There was discovered in our search for the controversial quotation an extremely interesting letter from President Grover Cleveland to Olney, dated March 27, 1898, which technically has no place here aside from that of interest in the man and his reaction to Secretary Olney's use of the quotation. The letter of Cleveland is so typical that I cannot refrain from quoting it:

I only yesterday had an opportunity to read your address, and I assure you I did it with the greatest satisfaction. When you intimated that the late G. Washington ever said anything that can be criticized or that by any chance does not fit every phase of our Nation's life, why, I just want a little time to consider that proposition. You see that comes pretty near to being treasonable, and a fellow shivers a little as he puts his foot in. (Letters of Grover Cleveland, by Allan Nevins, pp. 196, 197.)

I need not deal further with the wide use of the quotation from the turn of the century down to almost the present time, excepting to say that it was so extensively used that writers did accept it as valid, thus making the point of the challenge of the senior Senator from Idaho all the more pertinent, but at the same time weakens in a great degree the apology of the editor of the Washington Post. It is indeed unique in at least my editorial experiences to see an editor blown over by one mighty blast when he might have turned for justification to men of unquestioned authority. If editors base their generalizations, first, upon a single statement, and then upon a contradiction, editorial consistency, if that jewel can possibly be found, will not be of lasting worth.

We have tried to give these quotations as accurately as possible, but the little study we have made shows that Washington is quoted much as Shakespeare has credited the devil with quoting his Scripture, "for his own purpose."

The late H. H. B. Myer, director of the legislative reference service, wrote me of the evolution of the quotation between its appearance in 1898 with Olney and its arrival in 1934 in the Washington Post, and in a paragraph of his own Mr. Myer used these words:

It is not a forgery, but a misinterpretation. No evidence has been found to indicate that any of those concerned were intentionally misrepresenting.

Since 1919 the quotation has been used by those favoring America's cooperation with the institutions of the League of Nations. Even if the quotation came thundering directly from the lips of Washington it would not be valid argument for that. If we cooperate with the League, it must be justified in the light of the present. Washington's precepts are not valid because he uttered them but because they were based on demonstrated truth. Nothing that he may have said about the future could come within that rule.

Since the League of Nations was established it has performed a sufficient number of functions for us to know now from experience what functions it can or cannot perform. From experience we know that the fears that were entertained about it at first were unfounded. The League has not gotten anyone into war, as was at first feared it would do. Instead the League has prevented and stopped wars, not all wars, to be sure, but some wars. It is also interesting to see how the League has changed with the changing times, and has refused to be static. It is the most outstanding agency in the world today for the keeping of people out of war, and we now know that the United States may cooperate with the League's principle without doing violence to our traditional policies. For the League is merely an agent of its nation members, and not even the smallest has lost its ability to act for itself. I, for one, believe that cooperation with the League in one form or another is the best antiwar medicine that we can take at this time.

If the League of Nations does not take its place in the world, what are the alternatives? The League of Nations can afford to wait, but it is the only institution in Europe that can afford to wait. We do not need the League, we never have needed it, for with us it is merely a matter of moral support of ideas which from our own experience we know are sound. We have, though, an interest in the League, for we know that war is of universal concern or we never should have bothered with neutrality legislation. Peace, too, brings a universal blessing and that which holds out an ideal of peace has our lasting interest. But which way can Europe turn if she does not build up this power of unit action to drive away a return to the old alliance system, with its balance—a balance which, if it ever got out of control, meant war or uncertainty? Look at conditions in Europe today and answer the question for yourself. No longer are the problems of Europe purely economic, no longer are they purely political, no longer is it merely ambition of a dictator that threatens the welfare of man, but all Europe has turned as a result of universal fear to a simple security basis. Distrust, and with that rearmament, is in the minds of men. Even the minor states who have felt secure in the friendliness of a big neighbor are arming. This is the situation in Europe today.

Germany has not sufficiently rearmed or aligned its friends to be ready for war at this time. The other two single-willed states—Italy and Japan—wish a present peace, at least, in order to consolidate their recent gains. France, Great Britain, and the Soviet Union are steadily growing stronger, with France and Great Britain becoming more friendly with each other. Germany has failed to break up the French alliance, and the states of central Europe, together with Poland and Italy, are opposed to German expansion in the east. Likewise, the October entente between Italy and Germany has been weakened by Great Britain's and Italy's exchange of notes regarding the Mediterranean. Thus international controls are functioning. Nevertheless the international situation is highly unstable and dangerous and the problems of Europe remain unchanged.

Rearmament is world-wide, due in part to the expiration in December of the naval limitation treaties of 1922 and 1930, and also in part due to the unknown factors in regard to the marching feet of threatening aggressors. About 19 percent of the entire national incomes of Germany and of Russia is spent for armament. France expends 8 percent. Great Britain 6 percent, and the United States 2 percent. The present stalemate in Europe may be overcome by reason of changed economic conditions which may swing the sympathies of the people in central Europe toward one of the "isms." A civil conflict in Europe might well bring about a clash between Russia and Germany, as it has almost done in Spain. Germany is fast approaching economic bankruptcy because of her rearmament program, and when that financial limit is reached a new source must be found. Until an economic settlement between Germany and the other powers is reached, the international situation will continue to be precarious.

I repeat, What are the alternatives? Can the world continue the master contest based upon fear, distrust, and force, or shall it turn to the sobering advice of a Washington, whose spirit speaks to us today from between the lines of his words uttered in 1783? We need a sacred regard for public justice and the adoption of a proper peace establishment. For Europe it is collective action or continued fear, dread, and uncertainty.

America will not be unmindful of the spirit of uncertainty which broods over the world. She deplores this condition; but it is not her function to interfere in foreign quarrels. She stands for the peaceful settlement of differences. America's peaceful attitude is sincere and rests upon moral suasion. America reiterates her renunciation of war as a national policy. She proposes to adhere to the policy of friendly intercourse with nations at peace.

The American people have commended this administration's policies, expressed both in law and by proclamation, affecting our relations with nations at war. They rejoice over the repeal of the Platt amendment and the independence of the Philippines. They continue to respect international organization. They are proud of the accomplishments of the Pan American Union, and they congratulate this sisterhood of American States in its response to the good-neighbor attitude. Americans recognize the good to the world accomplished by the International Court of Arbitration and the International Labor Office. They favor adherence to the Permanent Court of International Justice with safeguards consistent with American traditions. Their faith in the ultimate triumph of a world controlled by law based on international morality has not dimmed. They propose to resist, resolutely, aggression against themselves; and they will guard against being drawn, by private trading or international banking, into other people's wars against their wishes, their interest, and their conscience. These things I do not say lightly, for on the first Tuesday after the first Monday of last November the American people defeated, in a way no major party ever suffered defeat before, that party which had denounced as unworthy of American membership the two greatest institutions for world peace established to preserve the nations of the earth from another world war, to one of which, paradoxically, three of that party's Presidents had recommended our adherence. The American people have not belittled and they will not belittle the purposes for which America fought in the World War, nor will they turn their backs upon the ideals for world peace proclaimed by our late great President, Woodrow Wilson. For 12 long years the belittlers of Wilson's mighty ideals talked about a mandate from the people. They now have a mandate, for the party that proposed "that America shall not become a member of the League of Nations nor of the World Court" carried but 2 States and elected but 5 Senators and but 89 Representatives. That is what I have called the people's mandate, but I will not press the point. I only hope this sloganized appeal is at last removed from our political argumentative vocabulary.

Thus ends what may be deemed purely an academic discussion. Washington, great as he was, sound as were his visions of the future, nor his associates could have envisioned that which is actually taking place. The fulfillment is greater than the dream. That which the Fathers wrought is so mighty in its ability to serve the welfare of men that one is justified in the conclusion that it was actually aided by Heaven. But we would do violence to Washington's thought, and I am sure, to his spirit if America of 1937 should interpret her duty, her right, her position, or her relation to the rest of the world in accordance with what the necessities of a struggling nation, barely removed from its swaddling clothes, made wise and necessary. America's eyes today must not be turned backward. America's hope today looks to the future and justifies itself in the past. The worth of democracy has been proved, its ability to serve and to stabilize and to grow has been recognized by all who view things as they are. The great institutions, both national and international, established and working as a result of democratic fundamentals, both in the world and at home, need, though, a new baptism, not of blood, not of sacrifice, not of suffering, but a baptism resting upon the concept of the worth-whileness of men, women, and children. Democracy reconceived, not as a nationalist movement to accomplish some competitive purpose in a world of conflict and contest but democracy conceived in the spirit of service built upon self-restraint and self-control that the processes of peace and good will may have a chance in the world; democracy with a single thought, and that to serve men, women, and children, that the lives of all these may be economically full, culturally complete, and free from unnecessary concern and worry; democracy nationally striving for the fuller life, internationally seeking to be a better neighbor—nationally or internationally, democracy is, after all, the world's one hope.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I wish to take a moment to address myself to the remarks of the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS].

The quotation which has been attributed to George Washington, and concerning which the debate has been proceeding for some time, is as follows:

> When, our institutions being firmly consolidated and working with complete success, we might safely and perhaps beneficially take part in the consultations held by foreign states for the advantage of the nations.

This, Mr. President, is in quotation marks; and it has been asserted in editorials and asserted by some writers of prominence that it is to be found in Washington's writings. Of course, it is not to be found in Washington's writings; and we have now the statement of the able Senator from Utah, who has made a thorough investigation, that it is not in Washington's writings. But that is not all. There is not to be found in Washington's writings a phrase or a sentence which is in harmony with the view expressed here. On the other hand, his writings are in direct contradiction, so far as their teachings are concerned or as concerns the principles with which they deal, with the principle which is embodied in this quotation.

The Senator from Utah seems to conclude that this quotation had its origin some 60 years after Washington's death in construction which was placed upon Washington's writings by the then Secretary of State, Mr. Seward. I think probably it is true that Mr. Seward did place such an interpretation upon Washington's address. How he could do so, what instigated him to do so, is beyond my comprehension, because it is an absolute contradiction of everything that Washington ever said on this subject. The construction was wholly gratuitous. Who put the quotation marks about the words in question I do not know. But those who asserted this language to be in Washington's address and those who put the quotations about it were impudent forgers and nothing less.

This is not a trivial matter. It is in contradiction of all the teachings of the Father of his Country, and it cannot be excused by saying that somebody has put his construction upon it. When it turned up a little later with quotation marks about it such action had its purpose and its objective, and I have no doubt that it was a sinister motive which put that construction upon it and put the quotation marks around it.

SIGNING OF AN ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION

The VICE PRESIDENT announced that, under authority of the order of the Senate of the 19th instant, the President pro tempore on that day signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. J. Res. 229) to make funds available for health and sanitation activities in the areas recently stricken by floods, which had previously been signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

COURT ORDERS RESTRAINING ENFORCEMENT OF LAWS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission relative to Senate Resolution 82 (agreed to Feb. 17, 1937), calling for certain information concerning injunctions or judgments issued or rendered by Federal courts since March 4, 1933, in cases involving acts of Congress, and stating in part:

> We understand this request to include only action taken by the Federal courts enjoining, suspending, or restraining enforcement, operation, and execution of acts of Congress, as distinguished from orders made by the Commission under authority conferred upon it by Congress; and since, generally speaking, the laws under which the Commission operates were passed upon and held to be constitutional prior to the date of March 4, 1933, above mentioned, we have no cases of the kind referred to in the resolution to report.

Which was ordered to lie on the table.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following resolution of the Senate of the State of New York, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

STATE OF NEW YORK, IN SENATE,
Albany, February 9, 1937.

Whereas the Congress of the United States provided in the War Risk Insurance Act that the Director shall "promptly determine upon and publish the full and exact terms and conditions of such contract of insurance" (Public, No. 90, 65th Cong., sec. 402); and

Whereas soldiers and marines paid for "war risk insurance" out of their earnings as soldiers and marines during the World War; and

Whereas although the Government of the United States accepted insurance premiums from World War veterans, and veterans assumed that such insurance protected them in case of "total and permanent disability" resulting from war injuries; and

Whereas the courts of the United States have held that "total and permanent disability" within the meaning of the War Risk Insurance Act means inability to follow "any gainful occupation"; and

Whereas by the rules and regulations of the director of the war risk insurance and the construction of the said rules and regulations by the courts, insurance protection to disabled veterans is of no force or effect, except in cases of "total disability", and soldiers and marines who lost a limb or eye or the use of hearing as a result of war injuries have not received insurance benefits paid for by them; and

Whereas, on the other hand, the Congress of the United States did provide that in the case of sailors injured during the World War the following sums should be paid as insurance:

"In case of any of the following losses, for the payment of the percentage of the principal sum adjudicated on the following tables:

	Percent
"One hand	50
"One arm	65
"One foot	50
"One eye	45

"Total destruction of hearing, 50 percent" (Public, No. 20, 65th Cong., sec. 3–A);

Now therefore, be it Resolved, That the Senate of the State of New York respectfully memorialize the Congress of the United States of America to amend the War Risk Insurance Act so as to provide that the amounts payable for insurance to sailors for World War injuries be paid to soldiers and marines for like injuries.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Idaho, which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation:

Legislature of the State of Idaho, Twenty-fourth Session. In the House of Representatives, House Joint Memorial No. 4

By Lewis. A joint memorial

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

We, your memorialists of the Legislature of the State of Idaho, respectfully represent:

Whereas, the paramount and immediate necessity for the successful progress of reclamation is the development and preservation of water, and

Whereas, many sections of the northwest are fostering plans for the diversion of the unappropriated waters of our inland rivers and lands, so that the same may be applied to the useful purposes of irrigation, and

Whereas, one of the feasible plans for the replenishing of the waters of the Snake River Valley is the diversion of the natural flow from the Yellowstone Lake into the Snake River, and

Whereas, the flood waters from the Yellowstone Lake now flow into the Mississippi River, and

Whereas, the flood control of the Mississippi River is one of the major projects of the United States, and

Whereas, the diversion of the flow of this water to the Snake River would reduce the flood waters of the Mississippi River. Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Idaho (the senate concurring) That we most respectfully urge upon the United States Reclamation Department and upon the Congress of the United States the favorable consideration of the legislation and of necessary appropriations to carry to completion a project that will divert the natural flow from the Yellowstone Lake into the Snake River, be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary of State of the State of Idaho be authorized and he is hereby directed to immediately forward certified copies of this Memorial to the Secretary of Interior, to the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America, and to the Senators and the Representatives in Congress from this State.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Kansas, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

House Concurrent Resolution No. 14, memorializing the Congress of the United States and the Members from Kansas to oppose the passage of any bill which makes provision for an increase in the number of judges of the Supreme Court

Whereas the President has submitted to the Congress a proposal for a reorganization of the judicial department; and

Whereas in such proposal the number of judges of the Supreme Court may be increased by the will of the President through the appointment of additional judges: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Kansas (the senate concurring therein), That the Congress of the United States is hereby respectfully requested to oppose any provision for an increase in the number of judges of the Supreme Court through the appointment, at the discretion of the President, of additional judges. That the Members of Congress from Kansas are hereby respectfully requested to vote against the passage of any bill which may include a provision for increasing the number of Judges of the Supreme Court. That the secretary of state is hereby authorized and directed to send copies of this resolution to the Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to each Member of the Kansas delegation in Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Nebraska, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to oppose the plan for the reorganization of the Federal courts as now introduced in Congress

(Introduced by L. C. Nuernberger, W. F. Haycock, Fred L. Carsten, and Frank J. Brady)

Whereas there has been introduced in the Congress of the United States a plan providing for the retirement of all Federal judges over the age of 70 years, or the appointment of an additional judge for each judge over that age, and for the increase of the number of Judges upon the Supreme Court of the United States; and

Whereas the Constitution of the United States provides means whereby it may be amended to provide for reorganization of the Federal courts if the same be necessary; and

Whereas the Legislature of the State of Nebraska is opposed to said plan and the passage of said legislation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Nebraska in fifty-second regular session assembled—

1. That the Legislature of the State of Nebraska hereby respectfully petitions and memorializes the Congress of the United States to oppose the plan now introduced in the Congress, or any similar plan for the increasing of the number of Judges upon the Supreme Court of the United States, or for the mandatory retirement of Federal judges over the age of 70 years.

2. That the chief clerk of this legislature is hereby ordered and directed forthwith to forward a copy of this resolution, properly authenticated and suitably engrossed, to the presiding officer of the United States Senate and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States Congress, and to the Senators and Congressmen representing the State of Nebraska in the Congress.

Resolution memorializing the Congress and the President of the United States to enact a Federal antilynch law

(Introduced by John Adams, Jr., of Douglas)

Whereas there is now pending before the Judiciary Committee of the Senate of the United States a Federal antilynch bill for the prevention of lynching and mob violence in the United States of America and its territories;

Whereas there have been over 5,000 lynchings in the United States in the last 50 years and only five convictions;

Whereas it is contrary to the constitutional provision that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law", and

Whereas lynching is inhuman, barbaric and uncivilized, and a reflection upon the people of this great Nation: Now, therefore, be it Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Nebraska assembled—

1. That this legislature does most earnestly petition and memorialize the Congress and the President of the United States to enact a Federal antilynch law, for the prevention of lynching in this Nation.

2. That the chief clerk of this legislature be instructed and directed forthwith to forward a copy of this resolution properly authenticated and suitably engrossed to the President of the United States, to the Vice President, to each of the Senators and Representatives representing this State in the National Congress, and to the Secretary of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Oregon, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

House Joint Memorial 8

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

We, your memorialists, the Legislature of the State of Oregon, respectfully represent:

Whereas it is believed that it would be desirable from a patriotic standpoint, as well as for the convenience of the friends and surviving relatives of the deceased veterans, to have a national cemetery located in the State of Oregon: Be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Oregon (the senate jointly concurring therein), That we, your memorialists, the Thirty-ninth Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, convened in regular session, respectfully petition the Congress of the United States to provide for the establishment and maintenance of a national cemetery within the State of Oregon; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be transmitted to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Member of the Oregon delegation in Congress, and that the secretary of state be instructed to have said memorial printed and transmitted to the above.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Oregon, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

House Joint Memorial No. 10

To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, in Congress assembled:

We, your memorialists, the Thirty-ninth Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, convened in regular session, respectfully request and petition as follows:

Whereas the present disposition of the naval and military forces and national defense establishments of the United States makes inadequate provision for the national defense requirements of the State of Oregon and the Columbia River area, as evidenced by the fact that there has been expended by the Federal Government in Oregon only six-tenths of 1 percent of the total Federal expenditures for national defense establishments on the continental Pacific coast; and

Whereas the Columbia River drains a territory of over 250,000 square miles, the second largest watershed in the United States, rich in agricultural, industrial, and mineral resources, and there are now being constructed on the Columbia River and its tributaries great power, navigation, irrigation, and flood-control projects which are destined to greatly increase the economic importance and national value of this area; and

Whereas the Columbia River entrance and channel have been improved for navigation to a degree comparable with the greatest world ports, the Columbia River estuary being the largest and deepest harbor between San Francisco and Puget Sound, and along the Columbia River and its tributaries are main arteries of rail, highway, and air-transportation routes between the interior and the Pacific coast; and

Whereas the State of Oregon, particularly the area on the Oregon coast and adjacent to the Columbia River, constitutes the most vulnerable part of the Pacific coast, there being no naval shore establishment in the more than 1,000 miles of coast line between San Francisco Bay and Puget Sound, only negligible and obsolete military harbor defenses at the mouth of the Columbia River and no provisions in the State of Oregon for military or naval aviation defense or offense: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Oregon (the senate jointly concurring therein), That we, your memorialists, the thirty-ninth legislative assembly of the State of Oregon, respectfully petition the Congress of the United States, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of War:

That sufficient funds be appropriated by the Congress and expended by the Navy and War Departments to provide more adequate national defenses for Oregon and the Columbia River area, particularly as follows:

Immediate development of the naval base site at Tongue Point, on the Columbia River, this site having been originally donated to the Navy Department by Clatsop County upon assurance from the Navy Department that the site would be developed as a base for light cruisers, destroyers, submarines, and aviation; the immediate development as requested herein to be commenced as provided in legislation now before the Congress, and the development to be continued as provided in the assurances originally made by the Navy Department.

Modernization and improvement of the present harbor defenses by allocation of modern defense weapons and increased personnel.

Establishment of a military air base and depots in the State of Oregon and allocation thereto of the usual complements of aviation units, maintenance facilities, and personnel; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be transmitted to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of War, and the Oregon congressional delegation, and that the secretary of state of the State of Oregon is hereby instructed to transmit the same.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Colorado, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

House Joint Resolution 7

Whereas the President of the United States has in a message to Congress proposed a reorganization of the Supreme Court and Federal judiciary and has submitted to Congress a program for such reorganization; and

Whereas it is apparent that such reorganization is much needed, and will further the ends of justice and promote the general welfare; and

Whereas the people of the State of Colorado are vitally interested in the courts of the land: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives of the thirty-first general assembly (the senate concurring herein), That the Congress of the United States is hereby respectfully memorialized and urged to assist the President in accomplishing the reorganization of the Supreme Court and the Federal judiciary as submitted by the President of the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Colorado be urged to assist the President in accomplishing the reorganization of the Supreme Court and Federal judiciary; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be forwarded to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Colorado, and to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and chairmen of the Judiciary Committees.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Colorado, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor:

House Joint Memorial No. 5

Whereas there is now pending in the Congress of the United States, Senate Resolution No. 298, which said resolution gives consideration to the problem of relief of thousands of unemployed and needy persons now designated as "transients"; and

Whereas due to the geographical position and climatic advantages of the State of Colorado and continued periods of unemployment, the problem of relief for such transients in the State of Colorado has become increasingly serious and alarming; and

Whereas no adequate solution of said problem can be accomplished without the coordinating activities of other States and the Federal Government under a unified Federal transient program; and

Whereas said Senate Resolution No. 298, proposes such a program of united Federal and State cooperation in the solution of the transient problem: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives of the thirty-first general assembly (the senate concurring herein), That the Congress of the United States be urged to take such action under Senate Resolution No. 298 as will speedily and adequately solve the problem of transient relief for the States of the United States; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the Senate of the United States and to the Senators and Representatives of the State of Colorado in Congress assembled.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Colorado, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

House Joint Memorial No. 6

Whereas it has come to the attention of the members of the Thirty-first General Assembly and officials of the State of Colorado that there is now pending in the Department of State negotiations for a treaty between the United States of America and the country of Mexico concerning the conservation, control, regulation, and use of waters which are beneficial to said countries; and

Whereas a treaty of this nature undoubtedly involves general agreements concerning the conservation, control, regulation, and use of the waters of the Colorado and Rio Grande Rivers, which arise in the State of Colorado and to which the State of Colorado contributes more than 70 percent of the entire flow of waters; and

Whereas any general treaty of the nature above mentioned would undoubtedly be injurious to the best interests of the people of the State of Colorado in that the State would be denied adequate representation to insure the conservation of the waters of the Colorado and Rio Grande Rivers and the use of said waters by the citizens of the State for beneficial purposes; and

Whereas any agreement or agreements, treaty or treaties between the United States of America and the country of Mexico concerning the waters of the Colorado and Rio Grande Rivers should be made the subject of special treaty or treaties between said countries, with adequate representation for the State of Colorado upon any commission or commissions established or created to carry out the provisions of said treaty or treaties: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Thirty-first General Assembly of the State of Colorado (the senate concurring herein), That in the undertaking of any negotiations toward the establishment of a treaty or treaties between the United States of America and the country of Mexico relative to the beneficial waters of said countries, the Secretary of State of the United States be respectfully requested and urged to make any agreement concerning the waters of the Colorado and Rio Grande Rivers the subject of a separate and distinct agreement or treaty; that the Congress of the United States be respectfully requested and urged to take whatever steps are necessary to insure the protection of the people of the State of Colorado by the negotiation and adoption of a separate agreement or treaty concerning the waters of the Colorado and Rio Grande Rivers; that the Senators and Representatives of the State of Colorado in Congress assembled are hereby respectfully requested and urged to exert their efforts to see that any negotiations relating to a treaty with Mexico on the Rio Grande River be conducted separately and apart from any negotiations relative to a treaty on the Colorado River, and that they insist that in any negotiations affecting either of said rivers the State of Colorado shall be adequately represented on any commission having such negotiations in charge, by a representative or representatives from Colorado residing in the river basin concerned. Be it further

Resolved, That copies of this memorial be forwarded to the President of the Senate of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, the Secretary of State of the United States, and the Senators and Representatives of the State of Colorado in Congress assembled.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, memorializing Congress to provide for the repayment of Wisconsin Emergency Relief Administration loans made to farmers in drought-stricken areas for working on county, township, or village municipal work projects, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, memorializing Congress to enact more simplified and stringent regulatory measures for aircraft and other legislation tending to lessen the hazards of aviation, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, urging Congress to allocate to the several States the entire appropriation authorized by the so-called George-Deen Act for vocational education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, memorializing Congress to amend the Federal Social Security Act so as to include other classes of labor, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the board of directors of the American Statistical Association, Washington, D. C., favoring the enactment of pending legislation to create a central statistical committee and a central statistical board, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the executive committee of the Contra Costa County (Calif.) Development Association, favoring the enactment of pending legislation providing for the establishment of a Coast Guard station on the shore of Contra Costa County, Calif., which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the committee on immigration and naturalization of the Federal Bar Association of New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut, at New York City, N. Y., requesting that the chairman of that committee be supplied with 10 copies of all reports on immigration and naturalization matters, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the executive committee of the Eleanor Roosevelt League of Women, of Michigan, favoring the prompt enactment, in substantially its present form, of the bill (S. 1392) to reorganize the judicial branch of the Government, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the directors of the Detroit (Mich.) Bar Association; the Ninth Ward Republican Club of Upper Darby, Delaware County, Pa.; and the New Century Club, of West Chester, Pa., protesting against the enactment of pending legislation to reorganize the judicial branch of the Government, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate the petition of the Fifth Annual Conference of the American Veterans' Association at Chicago, Ill., praying that that association be heard on certain recommendations concerning the Veterans' Administration in connection with the proposed legislation relative to reorganization of the executive branch of the Government, which was referred to the Select Committee on Government Organization.

He also laid before the Senate a paper from officers and members of the Markham Workingmen's Society, of Makinen, Minn., endorsing the stand of Representative JOHN T. BERNARD, of Minnesota, relative to the placing of an embargo on shipments of arms and munitions to Spain, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DUFFY presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

Joint resolution memorializing Congress to provide for the repayment of Wisconsin Emergency Relief Administration loans made to farmers in drought-stricken areas by working on county, township, or village municipal work projects

Whereas from December 1, 1934, to May 31, 1935, Wisconsin needy farmers signed promissory notes in consideration for seed or livestock feed supplied on purchase order by the Wisconsin Emergency Relief Administration and the Wisconsin Rural Rehabilitation Corporation, which seed or livestock feed was necessary to the life-sustaining operation of the farms; and

Whereas the terms of such loans called for repayment in money; and

Whereas the board of directors of the Wisconsin Rural Rehabilitation Corporation, to which corporation all drought promissory notes were transferred by the W. E. R. A. on December 26, 1935, on April 1, 1936, voted to permit the farmers to work off on county, township, or village municipal projects one-half of the unpaid balance of said drought notes as of July 31, 1936; and

Whereas due to the poor crops resulting from drought and scorching heat in 1936 in many sections of the State, such farmers now find it impossible to make repayment of the other one-half of the principal and interest of such loans in cash; and

Whereas the repayment of such loans in money will impose a hardship and retard the progress of the farmers in regaining a self-sufficient basis; and

Whereas the financial condition of many of the municipalities in the drought-stricken sections renders it impossible to conduct their ordinary and regular municipal work and duties; and

Whereas, if enabled, many of such borrowers could repay such loans by labor performed on municipal projects with great benefit to the farmers and the communities; now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That this legislature respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to enact legislation permitting drought-relief loans to be repaid in full by allowing such farmers to work on municipal projects; be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be transmitted to both Houses of Congress of the United States and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

Mr. DUFFY also presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Joint resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to enact more simplified and stringent regulatory measures for aircraft and other legislation tending to lessen the hazards of aviation

Whereas the United States in the year 1936 was the scene of numerous major crashes of scheduled United States airliners; and

Whereas the death toll for that year in crashes of scheduled transport planes alone was 59, the highest in history; and

Whereas this figure does not include the large number of fatalities of pilots, copilots, students, passengers, aircraft crews, ground personnel and spectators in miscellaneous civil aircraft accidents for this period; and

Whereas fatal accidents in the air have been increasing in alarming proportions to the grave consternation of the American citizens; and

Whereas the Bureau of Air Commerce has failed to determine the cause or offer a remedy for the decided increase in aircraft accidents; and

Whereas those acquainted with aviation are in accord that what is needed to curb disasters in the air is more money, better equipment, more simplified and stringent Government regulations and an improved personnel to guide the destinies of aviation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That the legislature of the State of Wisconsin respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to take immediate steps to enact more simplified and comprehensive regulatory measures for aircraft and aviation legislation, to provide money for the purchase and operation of high-grade aeronautic equipment and the hiring of highly trained men in our air commerce department and such other provisions as may tend to lessen the hazards of flying; and be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be sent to both houses of Congress and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

Mr. DUFFY also presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor:

Joint resolution urging the Congress of the United States to allocate to the several States the whole appropriation authorized by the George-Deen Act for vocational education

Whereas the George-Deen Act, passed at the second session of the Seventy-fourth Congress and approved by the President on June 8, 1936, authorized an appropriation of $14,200,000 as Federal aids for the further development of vocational education in the several States and Territories; and

Whereas it was the intent and purpose of the Congress and the President under the George-Deen Act to increase Federal participation in the fields of trades and industry, agriculture, rural home economics, distributive occupations, and teacher training; and

Whereas, following the approval by the President of the George-Deen Act on June 8, 1936, the several States and Territories prepared to develop programs commensurate with the purposes and intent of the Federal Vocational Act and in reliance upon the full Federal aids to be made available thereunder; and

Whereas in the Executive Budget recently submitted to the first session of the Seventy-fifth Congress only $3,000,000 of the $14,200,000 appropriation authorized by the George-Deen Act has been allocated to the several States and Territories, which amount so far as Wisconsin is concerned is grossly inadequate to carry out effectively the present program of vocational education Federally aided under the George-Ellzey Act, which expires on June 30, 1937; and

Whereas the Seventy-fourth Congress gave most careful consideration to the needs of the country in considering and passing the George-Deen Act by nearly a unanimous vote, and had in mind the following impelling reasons, among others, for enacting the measure:

1. That the rural areas of the United States are facing an emergency in that farmers are confronted with difficult problems of agricultural adjustment, farm credit, production, and reduced incomes; that such conditions definitely indicate an expanded vocational program in the rural areas.

2. That the unemployment situation in both urban and rural communities has created a permanent need for an expanded vocational program to prevent the unemployed from becoming permanently unemployable.

3. That in Wisconsin and in many States most rural communities are unable to finance the needed expansion of vocational programs for the farmer, industrial worker, and unemployed youth; and

Whereas the expanding program and the growing apprenticeship requirements for vocational training would be seriously and irreparably curtailed unless Federal participation is maintained in accordance with the intent and provisions of the George-Deen Act; and

Whereas the entire Wisconsin program for vocational education, rural and urban, is dependent upon permanent and assured Federal participation as provided for in the George-Deen Act; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That this legislature respectfully petitions the Seventy-fifth Congress of the United States to restore in the President's Executive Budget the original amount of $14,200,000 authorized for Federal aids for vocational education by the Seventy-fourth Congress under the terms of the George-Deen Act; be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, to each House of the Congress, to each Wisconsin Member of Congress, to the several members of the Federal Board for Vocational Education, to the United States Commissioner of Education, and to the President's Committee on Vocational Education.

Mr. DUFFY also presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Joint Resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to amend the Federal Social Security Act to include other classes of labor

Whereas under the provisions of title II of the Federal Social Security Act, farmers, agricultural labor, domestic service in private homes, certain other designated classes of labor, and any person who has sufficient initiative to employ himself, are excluded from all benefits conferred thereunder; and

Whereas 50 percent of the funds necessary for the payment of the old-age benefits are obtained, under the provisions of title VIII of said act, by an excise tax on employers; and

Whereas such employers will of necessity in practically every instance add their share of the cost to the sale price of their products, or to the price of the service they render; and

Whereas farmers, agricultural laborers, domestic servants in private homes, and the other classes of labor excluded from the benefits under the Social Security Act are all consumers and contribute to the old-age benefit fund every time they make a purchase, either of commodities or of service, from an employer who pays toward said fund; and

Whereas it is grossly unfair to exact indirect contributions from this excepted class of labor for the benefit of others and then deny equal benefits and an opportunity of security and protection to them; and

Whereas this excepted class constitutes a very large percentage of the population of the country and should be afforded the same safeguards against the insecurities of life through cooperative effort as others; now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to enact amendments to the Social Security Act providing for the inclusion of farmers, agricultural labor, domestic service in private homes, and others who are without benefit of retirement funds provided for by law. Be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, to both Houses of the Congress of the United States and to each Wisconsin member thereof.

EMBARGOES ON IMPORTATIONS OF LIVESTOCK

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, there has been transmitted to my colleague, the junior Senator from Wyoming (Mr. SCHWARTZ), and myself a memorial adopted by the Legislature of the State of Wyoming expressing opposition to the repeal or modification of livestock embargoes affecting foreign countries. I ask that the memorial may be printed in the RECORD and that it be transmitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Enrolled Joint Memorial No. 1, Senate, Twenty-fourth Legislature of the State of Wyoming, opposing modifications of existing Federal laws and regulations governing importations of livestock or unsterilized livestock products from countries harboring transmissible diseases of livestock

Whereas a certain treaty has been signed by representatives of the United States and the Argentine Republic and has been submitted to the United States Senate for ratification, which said treaty is commonly known as the Argentine Sanitary Pact, and

Whereas the operation of said treaty would have the effect of suspending or modifying the existing embargo against importations of livestock and unsterilized livestock products from numerous countries harboring foot-and-mouth and other contagious and infectious diseases of livestock which do not now exist in the United States, and

Whereas the United States has in the past spent millions of dollars in the eradication of foot-and-mouth disease brought into this country through livestock products of foreign origin: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, by the Senate of the State of Wyoming (the house of representatives concurring), That these bodies vigorously oppose any change either by treaty or modification of existing laws, or existing Federal embargoes against the importation of livestock or unsterilized livestock products from any foreign country where foot-and-mouth disease is known to exist; be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of this resolution be forwarded by the Governor to the President of the United States, the Secretary of State at Washington, D. C., the Presiding Officer of the United States Senate, and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States, and the Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate and of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to United States Senators JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY and HARRY H. SCHWARTZ.

RESERVES UNDER FEDERAL OLD-AGE BENEFIT PLAN

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I am instructed by the Senate Finance Committee to ask that there be printed in the RECORD a letter from the Social Security Board commenting upon my Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 4, dealing with compulsory old-age pensions.

The Senate Finance Committee had a full hearing this morning on the subject. We discussed at great length with the members of the Board the possible desirability of doing away with the full reserve system, and thus escaping the ultimate challenge of the enormous $47,000,000,000 reserve which otherwise is involved.

I ask that the letter, as requested by the Finance Committee, be printed in the RECORD; and in addition I ask that a list of 60 presidents of 60 leading life-insurance companies of the United States be printed in the RECORD, this list representing the gentlemen of greatest experience in connection with insurance, who unitedly testified that the full reserve system is not necessary in a Government insurance system, but that the Government system can safely and wisely operate on a pay-as-you-go basis with only a moderate contingent reserve.

I desire to state in this connection that the Finance Committee this morning created a special committee, consisting of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], and myself, to act with the members of the Social Security Board in forming a general advisory council from among the insurance and social service experts of the country for the purpose of surveying the question of reserves. If the full reserve system can be changed as proposed, it will be to the advantage of the pensioners and the pay roll taxpayers, and it will eliminate an enormous economic and governmental hazard.

There being no objection, the letter and list were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEBRUARY 20, 1937.

Hon. PAT HARRISON,
Chairman, Committee on Finance,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR HARRISON: We are in receipt of your letter of February 2, relative to Senate Concurrent Resolution 4. While the introductory paragraph of this resolution refers to the "hazards of old age, unemployment, and other disabilities", it deals entirely with the Federal old-age benefits plan. As regards the Federal old-age benefits plan, it deals only with certain aspects thereof.

In substance, the resolution directs the Social Security Board to report to Congress either a plan to start the payment of Federal old-age benefits sooner and in more liberal amounts during the next 10 to 20 years (without, however, increasing benefits for those retiring in later years) or a plan to leave benefit payments as now provided, but to reduce pay-roll taxes. The resolution also directs the Social Security Board to report a plan to extend the coverage of the Federal old-age benefits plan.

Inasmuch as the resolution is specifically related only to the Federal old-age benefits plan, the Board assumes it is desired that the Board's comments be limited to that phase of the Social Security program. These comments are as follows:

1. Every worker, no matter how young he is when he enters taxable employment nor how much he is paid, will always receive in benefits more than he has paid in taxes. Moreover, the monthly benefit payable will always be more than any worker could purchase from a private insurance company at present rates with the amount of money which he will have paid in taxes. It is true that a larger proportion of the employer's tax which is levied upon the total pay roll may be considered as offsetting the payment of benefits to workers now nearing retirement. This is also true of all private pension plans and of all Government retirement plans.

2. Under any old age retirement plan like the plan established by the Social Security Act which expects to be self-supporting, unless funds are collected during the early years over and above the amounts payable in benefits each year, eventual financial provision (in the case of the Social Security Act, eventual tax rates) will have to be increased radically. This is because the number drawing pensions starts at zero and increases indefinitely both because of a steady gain in the proportion of the aged qualifying for benefits and because of the gain in the total number and proportion of the aged. Moreover, under an old-age retirement system providing pensions bearing some proportion to past earnings the average pension payable to those retiring in successive years will increase each year for an indefinite period. Thus, under the present Federal old-age benefit plan it is thought that the total amount of monthly benefits payable each year will increase up to a figure of at least $3,000,000,000 in 1980.

3. The Government would have to levy approximately 5 percent on pay rolls from the very beginning if it wished to fix a rate that apparently would offset, without change for a considerable period into the future, the cost of benefits as they come due without recourse to any other funds except sums collected to pay interest upon the accumulated reserve at the rate of 3 percent. Under the present plan the equivalent of this 5 percent rate is presumably present in the present 2-percent tax rate which increases triennially by 1 percent until the maximum of 6 percent is reached in 1949. To counteract the inadequacy which would be present in early monthly old-age benefits, were they based upon a constant relationship to earnings, a higher rate of benefits is allowed for the early wages than later wages. If this more liberal allowance for early wages were recognized as it would be in group annuity insurance as "accruing liability" the present value of future benefits arising from current wage payments would exceed the expected tax collections under title VIII over a long period of time. It is estimated that during the first year of operation alone this accruing liability would amount to $5,000,000,000 against probable tax collections of $600,000,000. By 1946 this accruing liability would probably amount to $25,000,000,000 whereas it is anticipated that the residue of tax collections over benefit payments and administrative expenses, with interest at 3 percent compounded annually, probably will amount to but $9,000,000,000, an apparent deficiency of $16,000,000,000.

4. The present scale of taxes was deemed to be sufficiently large so that for a considerable period into the future the sum of the expected tax collections less administrative costs plus interest on the accumulated funds would be substantially in excess of the total benefit payments. By 1980, according to estimates of the progress of the program there might be a fund of $47,000,000,000 which would be about two-thirds of the reserve which a private insurance company probably would expect to accumulate. If no interest-bearing reserve is accumulated and no other revenue is provided, the pay-roll taxes required would probably have to be increased to 10 percent by 1980.

5. One of the assumptions entering into the estimated ultimate cost has been that before 1980 a stable population would be reached, a rather dubious assumption. Many other assumptions entering into these cost estimates are extremely crude and have not been made with any belief that they can possibly foretell what future benefits will be in a time so far removed from the present. This somewhat arbitrary estimate of a maximum reserve of $47,000,000,000 may be considered as representing $14,000,000,000 collected in pay-roll taxes in excess of cash benefits already paid, the balance of $33,000,000,000 representing interest and compound interest thereon.

6. Had the interest on the reserve account been compounded at 2½ percent (about the present average rate of return on Federal obligations), instead of 3 percent as provided in the law, the amount of compound interest contributed to the reserve would be $25,000,000,000 instead of $33,000,000,000. The excess of $8,000,000,000 through estimating 3 percent instead of 2½ percent could be considered as a Government subsidy. Similarly, if it is recognized that a conceivable method would call for no interest payments, such a Government subsidy would be $33,000,000,000.

7. It is possible to develop a plan to start Federal old-age benefits sooner and to pay such benefits in more liberal amounts during the early years without increasing benefits for those retiring in later years.

8. It is also possible to develop a schedule of reduced pay-roll taxes. However, the present tax rate, which the resolution indicates is satisfactory, is not increased for 3 years, so this is not an immediate problem.

9. Reduction in tax rates or increase in benefit rates under the Federal old-age benefits system would reduce the reserve below the amount estimated to be necessary to keep the system on a self-sustaining basis. However, the advantage of the self-sustaining principle is lessened as the proportion of the gainfully occupied persons protected by the system is increased. At present that proportion is about 50 percent, and most of the cost of the benefits is met by the beneficiaries, whereas the abandonment of the self-sustaining principle would transfer an undue proportion of this cost to the 50 percent not covered by the system.

10. The problem of extending the coverage of the Federal old-age benefits system is largely a problem of developing appropriate administrative processes (particularly tax-collection techniques) in the case of such large excluded groups as domestic servants and farmers. Moreover, the type of legislation and the kind of administrative procedures to be developed depend to a considerable extent upon the definition of Federal powers by the courts. Since very little administrative experience is yet available, and the courts have not yet passed upon the constitutionality of the Federal powers involved, if legislative action is taken at this time to extend coverage to groups now excluded, such as domestic servants and farmers, such action should be made effective not earlier than January 1, 1939.

11. It is highly desirable that as soon as practicable provision be made for paying monthly benefits to those permanently disabled and to survivors of beneficiaries under the Federal old-age benefits plan. However, some of the problems involved require extended study and consideration.

In accordance with the duty placed upon it by section 702 of the Social Security Act the Board has been studying the problems touched upon by this resolution, as well as a number of other problems intimately related thereto. Some information has already been assembled and more will be assembled as quickly as possible.

The Board will be glad to be of as much service as possible to the committee.

Sincerely,

——— ———, Chairman.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, Feb. 23, 1937, at 12 o'clock meridian.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1937

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our everlasting Father, Thy marvelous Providence is seen in shaping and guiding the destinies of men and nations. Thou hast raised up a man clothed in majesty to sustain and with might to overcome the giant forces arrayed against the march of civilization. Today the heart of our country is stirred in praise and gratitude for the peerless Washington, first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen. We thank Thee for this patriot, statesmen, and Christian gentleman who knelt at the altar of sacrifice that freedom from tyrannical domination might live. In this sacred hour as we are reminded of the providential epochs of his life and the wisdom of his deathless words, may we seek to emulate his courage, persistence, and his undying devotion which are the admiration of the world.

Blessed Lord, let us feel Thy spirit bowing over us in holy benediction, of whom the world was not worthy. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, February 19, was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The Chairman will recognize gentlemen to submit unanimous-consent requests.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and insert therein certain excerpts from a speech made by Mr. C. H. March, former member of the Federal Trade Commission and now a member of that Commission.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is he at the present time a member of the Commission?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

(Mr. MAVERICK and Mr. LUDLOW asked and were given permission to extend their remarks in the RECORD.)

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a radio address made by our colleague the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. GUYER].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to insert therein a radio address which I am going to make at 1: 30 this afternoon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein a brief quotation from certain items of historic interest.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNYDER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein a radio address made by myself last Friday evening on the subject of our national defense.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and insert therein a small article with reference to the life of one of my constituents who offered himself to a test in connection with yellow fever back in the Spanish-American War days. This man died some days ago.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is that a newspaper article?

Mr. FULMER. It is a very short article on the life of this man to whom I referred.

Mr. RICH. We cannot permit newspaper articles to go into the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. RICH. It is a newspaper article, and I therefore object.

Mr. FULMER. If the gentleman will withhold his objection a moment, may I say this is a very short article about a man who died some days ago. This man offered himself as a test in connection with the yellow-fever peril back in the Spanish-American War days.

Mr. RICH. May I say to the gentleman I am not opposed and cannot oppose anything that the gentleman may want to put in the RECORD in the way of his own remarks, but when he holds up a newspaper article he knows it is against the rules of the House and the rules of the Joint Committee on Printing to have newspaper articles incorporated in the RECORD.

Mr. FULMER. This is a very short article giving the life of this very distinguished American hero.

Mr. RICH. Is the gentleman going to put this in as his article?

Mr. FULMER. Yes.

Mr. RICH. Then I will not object. I may say to the Members of the House and to the gentleman when he holds up a newspaper article and wants to insert it in the RECORD we cannot permit that because we may have everything inserted in the RECORD from newspaper articles. This is strictly contrary to the rules.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

(Mr. KOPPLEMANN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.)

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute to ask the gentleman from Texas, our leader, a question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. May I ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] if he will be good enough to inform me when there will be a report from the Appropriations Committee on the bill known as the naval appropriation bill?

Mr. RAYBURN. I think on next Thursday. The chairman of the subcommittee spoke to me on Friday and said he would know definitely tomorrow.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. The report will be submitted on Thursday?

Mr. RAYBURN. I think it will be out on Wednesday. The bill will be called up for consideration on Thursday.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. That is the information I wanted. May I suggest to the gentleman from Texas that those who are interested, and I personally am interested in that measure, should be given an opportunity to read and study this bill thoroughly.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 additional minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Speaker, my purpose in rising at this time is to suggest that we have more opportunity to study this measure in order to be prepared to act more intelligently upon it. If it is reported on Wednesday at the very earliest and called up on Thursday, there will be a repetition of what happened last year when a bill was submitted, reported, and within 2 days voted upon by this House. This is too important a matter to be acted on in that way.

Mr. RAYBURN. I may say to the gentleman there will be at least 1 day of general debate on the measure when it comes up in the House for consideration. General debate will then go over until Friday, which will allow 2 nights and a day for study.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. It is my opinion, sir, that is hardly sufficient time for study and deliberation upon a measure of such importance and carrying so tremendous an appropriation. It seems to me we ought to have more time. There is no reason to rush these matters.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a speech I made over the radio recently on the so-called proposal to reform the judiciary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. SCRUGHAM (at the request of Mr. CARTER), for 1 week, on account of death in family.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address of our colleague the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MOTT] on the occasion of Lincoln's Birthday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection.

WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS

The SPEAKER. On January 29, 1937, the following order was had:

On motion of Mr. RANKIN, by unanimous consent, ordered: That on Monday, February 22, 1937, after the reading of the Journal and disposition of business on the Speaker's table, it shall be in order for the Speaker to designate a Member who shall read Washington's Farewell Address.

Pursuant to the above motion, the Chair has designated the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. O'NEILL] to deliver Washington's Farewell Address.

Mr. O'NEILL of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, may I acknowledge my appreciation of the honor that comes to me in being designated to recall to our colleagues these memorable and still timely words:

To the people of the United States.

FRIENDS AND FELLOW CITIZENS: The period for a new election of a citizen to administer the executive government of the United States being not far distant, and the time actually arrived when your thoughts must be employed in designating the person who is to be clothed with that important trust, it appears to me proper, especially as it may conduce to a more distinct expression of the public voice, that I should now apprise you of the resolution I have formed, to decline being considered among the number of those, out of whom a choice is to be made.

I beg you, at the same time, to do me the justice to be assured, that this resolution has not been taken, without a strict regard to all the considerations appertaining to the relation which binds a dutiful citizen to his country; and that, in withdrawing the tender of service which silence in my situation might imply, I am influenced by no diminution of zeal for your future interest; no deficiency of grateful respect for your past kindness; but am supported by a full conviction that the step is compatible with both.

The acceptance of, and continuance hitherto in the office to which your suffrages have twice called me, have been a uniform sacrifice of inclination to the opinion of duty, and to a deference for what appeared to be your desire. I constantly hoped that it would have been much earlier in my power, consistently with motives which I was not at liberty to disregard, to return to that retirement from which I had been reluctantly drawn. The strength of my inclination to do this, previous to the last election, had even led to the preparation of an address to declare it to you; but mature reflection on the then perplexed and critical posture of our affairs with foreign nations, and the unanimous advice of persons entitled to my confidence, impelled me to abandon the idea.

I rejoice that the state of your concerns external as well as internal, no longer renders the pursuit of inclination incompatible with the sentiment of duty or propriety; and am persuaded, whatever partiality may be retained for my services, that in the present circumstances of our country, you will not disapprove my determination to retire.

The impressions with which I first undertook the arduous trust, were explained on the proper occasion. In the discharge of this trust, I will only say that I have, with good intentions, contributed towards the organization and administration of the government, the best exertions of which a very fallible judgment was capable. Not unconscious in the outset, of the inferiority of my qualifications, experience, in my own eyes, perhaps still more in the eyes of others, has strengthened the motives to diffidence of myself; and, every day, the increasing weight of years admonishes me more and more, that the shade of retirement is as necessary to me as it will be welcome. Satisfied that if any circumstances have given peculiar value to my services they were temporary, I have the consolation to believe that, while choice and prudence invite me to quit the political scene, patriotism does not forbid it.

In looking forward to the moment which is to terminate the career of my political life, my feelings do not permit me to suspend the deep acknowledgment of that debt of gratitude which I owe to my beloved country, for the many honors it has conferred upon me; still more for the steadfast confidence with which it has supported me; and for the opportunities I have thence enjoyed of manifesting my inviolable attachment, by services faithful and persevering, though in usefulness unequal to my zeal. If benefits have resulted to our country from these services, let it always be remembered to your praise, and as an instructive example in our annals, that under circumstances in which the passions, agitated in every direction, were liable to mislead amidst appearances sometimes dubious, vicissitudes of fortune often discouraging—in situations in which not unfrequently, want of success has countenanced the spirit of criticism,—the constancy of your support was the essential prop of the efforts, and a guarantee of the plans, by which they were effected. Profoundly penetrated with this idea, I shall carry it with me to my grave, as a strong incitement to unceasing vows that heaven may continue to you the choicest tokens of its beneficence—that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual—that the free constitution, which is the work of your hands, may be sacredly maintained—that its administration in every department may be stamped with wisdom and virtue—that, in fine, the happiness of the people of these states, under the auspices of liberty, may be made complete by so careful a preservation, and so prudent a use of this blessing, as will acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection and adoption of every nation which is yet a stranger to it.

Here, perhaps, I ought to stop. But a solicitude for your welfare, which cannot end but with my life, and the apprehension of danger, natural to that solicitude, urge me, on an occasion like the present, to offer to your solemn contemplation, and to recommend to your frequent review, some sentiments which are the result of much reflection, of no inconsiderable observation, and which appear to me all important to the permanency of your felicity as a people. These will be offered to you with the more freedom, as you can only see in them the disinterested warnings of a parting friend, who can possibly have no personal motive to bias his counsel. Nor can I forget, as an encouragement to it, your indulgent reception of my sentiments on a former and not dissimilar occasion.

Interwoven as is the love of liberty with every ligament of your hearts, no recommendation of mine is necessary to fortify or confirm the attachment.

The unity of government which constitutes you one people, is also now dear to you. It is justly so; for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence; the support of your tranquility at home; your peace abroad; of your safety; of your prosperity; of that very liberty which you so highly prize. But, as it is easy to foresee that, from different causes and from different quarters much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth; as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed; it is of infinite moment, that you should properly estimate the immense value of your national union to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it; accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as of the palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can, in any event, be abandoned; and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts.

For this you have every inducement of sympathy and interest. Citizens by birth, or choice, of a common country, that country has a right to concentrate your affections. The name of American, which belongs to you in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of patriotism, more than any appellation derived from local discriminations. With slight shades of difference, you have the same religion, manners, habits, and political principles. You have, in a common cause, fought and triumphed together; the independence and liberty you possess, are the work of joint counsels, and joint efforts, of common dangers, sufferings and successes.

But these considerations, however powerfully they address themselves to your sensibility, are greatly outweighed by those which apply more immediately to your interest.—Here, every portion of our country finds the most commanding motives for carefully guarding and preserving the union of the whole.

The north, in an unrestrained intercourse with the south, protected by the equal laws of a common government, finds in the productions of the latter, great additional resources of maritime and commercial enterprise, and precious materials of manufacturing industry.—The south, in the same intercourse, benefiting by the same agency of the north, sees its agriculture grow and its commerce expand. Turning partly into its own channels the seamen of the north, it finds its particular navigation invigorated; and while it contributes, in different ways, to nourish and increase the general mass of the national navigation, it looks forward to the protection of a maritime strength, to which itself is unequally adapted. The east, in a like intercourse with the west, already finds, and in the progressive improvement of interior communications by land and water, will more and more find a valuable vent for the commodities which it brings from abroad, or manufactures at home. The west derives from the east supplies requisite to its growth and comfort—and what is perhaps of still greater consequence, it must of necessity owe the secure enjoyment of indispensable outlets for its own productions, to the weight, influence, and the future maritime strength of the Atlantic side of the Union, directed by an indissoluble community of interest as one nation. Any other tenure by which the west can hold this essential advantage, whether derived from its own separate strength; or from an apostate and unnatural connection with any foreign power, must be intrinsically precarious.

While then every part of our country thus feels an immediate and particular interest in union, all the parts combined cannot fail to find in the united mass of means and efforts, greater strength, greater resource, proportionably greater security from external danger, a less frequent interruption of their peace by foreign nations; and, what is of inestimable value, they must derive from union, an exemption from those broils and wars between themselves, which so frequently afflict neighboring countries not tied together by the same government; which their own rivalship alone would be sufficient to produce, but which opposite foreign alliances, attachments, and intrigues, would stimulate and embitter.—Hence likewise, they will avoid the necessity of those overgrown military establishments, which under any form of government are inauspicious to liberty, and which are to be regarded as particularly hostile to republican liberty. In this sense it is, that your union ought to be considered as a main prop of your liberty, and that the love of the one ought to endear to you the preservation of the other.

These considerations speak a persuasive language to every reflecting and virtuous mind and exhibit the continuance of the union as a primary object of patriotic desire. Is there a doubt whether a common government can embrace so large a sphere? let experience solve it. To listen to mere speculation in such a case were criminal. We are authorized to hope that a proper organization of the whole, with the auxiliary agency of governments for the respective subdivisions, will afford a happy issue to the experiment. It is well worth a fair and full experiment. With such powerful and obvious motives to union, affecting all parts of our country, while experience shall not have demonstrated its impracticability, there will always be reason to distrust the patriotism of those who, in any quarter, may endeavor to weaken its hands.

In contemplating the causes which may disturb our Union, it occurs as matter of serious concern, that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by geographical discriminations,—northern and southern—Atlantic and western; whence designing men may endeavor to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of party to acquire influence within particular districts, is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You cannot shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heart burnings which spring from these misrepresentations: they tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection. The inhabitants of our western country have lately had a useful lesson on this head: they have seen, in the negotiation by the executive, and in the unanimous ratification by the senate of the treaty with Spain, and in the universal satisfaction at the event throughout the United States, a decisive proof how unfounded were the suspicions propagated among them of a policy in the general government and in the Atlantic states, unfriendly to their interests in regard to the Mississippi. They have been witnesses to the formation of two treaties, that with Great Britain and that with Spain, which secure to them everything they could desire in respect to our foreign relations, towards confirming their prosperity. Will it not be their wisdom to rely for the preservation of these advantages on the union by which they were procured? will they not henceforth be deaf to those advisers, if such they are, who would sever them from their brethren and connect them with aliens?

To the efficacy and permanency of your Union, a government for the whole is indispensable. No alliances, however strict, between the parts can be an adequate substitute; they must inevitably experience the infractions and interruptions which all alliances, in all times, have experienced. Sensible of this momentous truth, you have improved upon your first essay, by the adoption of a constitution of government, better calculated than your former, for an intimate union, and for the efficacious management of your common concerns. This government, the offspring of our own choice, uninfluenced and unawed, adopted upon full investigation and mature deliberation, completely free in its principles, in the distribution of its powers, uniting security with energy, and maintaining within itself a provision for its own amendment, has a just claim to your confidence and your support. Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government.—But the constitution which at any time exists, until changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all. The very idea of the power, and the right of the people to establish government, presuppose the duty of every individual to obey the established government.

All obstructions to the execution of the laws, all combinations and associations under whatever plausible character, with the real design to direct, control, counteract, or awe the regular deliberations and action of the constituted authorities, are destructive of this fundamental principle, and of fatal tendency.—They serve to organize faction, to give it an artificial and extraordinary force, to put in the place of the delegated will of the nation the will of party, often a small but artful and enterprising minority of the community; and, according to the alternate triumphs of different parties, to make the public administration the mirror of the ill concerted and incongruous projects of faction, rather than the organ of consistent and wholesome plans digested by common councils, and modified by mutual interests.

However combinations or associations of the above description may now and then answer popular ends, they are likely, in the course of time and things, to become potent engines, by which cunning, ambitious, and unprincipled men, will be enabled to subvert the power of the people, and to usurp for themselves the reins of government; destroying afterwards the very engines which have lifted them to unjust dominion.

Towards the preservation of your government and the permanency of your present happy state, it is requisite, not only that you steadily discountenance irregular opposition to its acknowledged authority, but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however spacious the pretext. One method of assault may be to effect, in the forms of the constitution, alterations which will impair the energy of the system; and thus to undermine what cannot be directly overthrown. In all the changes to which you may be invited, remember that time and habit are at least as necessary to fix the true character of governments, as of other human institutions:—that experience is the surest standard by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitution of a country:—that facility in changes, upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion, exposes to perpetual change from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion: and remember, especially, that for the efficient management of your common interests in a country so extensive as ours, a government of as much vigor as is consistent with the perfect security of liberty is indispensable. Liberty itself will find in such a government, with powers properly distributed and adjusted, its surest guardian. It is, indeed, little else than a name, where the government is too feeble to withstand the enterprises of faction, to confine each member of the society within the limits prescribed by the laws, and to maintain all in the secure and tranquil enjoyment of the rights of person and property.

I have already intimated to you the danger of parties in the state, with particular references to the founding them on geographical discrimination. Let me now take a more comprehensive view, and warn you in the most solemn manner against the baneful effects of the spirit of party generally.

This spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind.—It exists under different shapes in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed; but in those of the popular form it is seen in its greatest rankness, and is truly their worst enemy.

The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge natural to party dissension, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism.—But this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries which result, gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual; and, sooner or later, the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this disposition to the purpose of his own elevation on the ruins of public liberty.

Without looking forward to an extremity of this kind, (which nevertheless ought not to be entirely out of sight) the common and continual mischiefs of the spirit of party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it.

It serves always to distract the public councils, and enfeeble the public administration. It agitates the community with ill founded jealousies and false alarms; kindles the animosity of one part against another; foments occasional riot and insurrection. It opens the door to foreign influence and corruption, which finds a facilitated access to the government itself through the channels of party passions. Thus the policy and the will of one country are subjected to the policy and will of another.

There is an opinion that parties in free countries are useful checks upon the administration of the government, and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This within certain limits is probably true; and in governments of a monarchial cast, patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favor, upon the spirit of party. But in those of the popular character, in governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged. From their natural tendency, it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose. And there being constant danger of excess, the effort ought to be, by force of public opinion, to mitigate and assuage it. A fire not to be quenched, it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent it bursting into a flame, lest instead of warming, it should consume.

It is important likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration, to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department, to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominate in the human heart, is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasions of the others, has been evinced by experiments ancient and modern; some of them in our country and under our own eyes.—To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the constitution designates.—But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil, any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism, who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connections with private and public felicity. Let it simply be asked, where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? and let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect, that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle.

It is substantially true, that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government. The rule, indeed, extends with more or less force to every species of free government. Who that is a sincere friend to it can look with indifference upon attempts to shake the foundation of the fabric?

Promote, then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it should be enlightened.

As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible, avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering, also, that timely disbursements, to prepare for danger, frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it; avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions, in time of peace, to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars may have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burden which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your representatives, but it is necessary that public opinion should co-operate. To facilitate to them the performance of their duty, it is essential that you should practically bear in mind, that towards the payment of debts there must be revenue; that to have revenue there must be taxes; that no taxes can be devised which are not more or less inconvenient and unpleasant; that the intrinsic embarrassment inseparable from the selection of the proper object (which is always a choice of difficulties,) ought to be a decisive motive for a candid construction of the conduct of the government in making it, and for a spirit of acquiescence in the measures for obtaining revenue, which the public exigencies may at any time dictate.

Observe good faith and justice towards all nations; cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct, and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and, at no distant period, a great nation, to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt but, in the course of time and things, the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages which might be lost by a steady adherence to it; can it be that Providence has not connected the permanent felicity of a nation with its virtue? The experiment, at least, is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature. Alas! is it rendered impossible by its vices?

In the execution of such a plan, nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others, should be excluded; and that, in place of them, just and amicable feelings towards all should be cultivated. The nation which indulges towards another an habitual hatred, or an habitual fondness, is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. Antipathy in one nation against another disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur. Hence, frequent collisions, obstinate, envenomed, and bloody contests. The nation, prompted by ill will and resentment, sometimes impels to war the government, contrary to the best calculations of policy. The government sometimes participates in the national propensity, and adopts through passion what reason would reject; at other times, it makes the animosity of the nation subservient to projects of hostility, instigated by pride, ambition, and other sinister and pernicious motives. The peace often, sometimes perhaps the liberty of nations, has been the victim.

So likewise, a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest, in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter, without adequate inducements or justifications. It leads also to concessions, to the favorite nation, of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions, by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained, and by exciting jealousy, ill will, and a disposition to retaliate in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld; and it gives to ambitious, corrupted or deluded citizens who devote themselves to the favorite nation, facility to betray or sacrifice the interests of their own country, without odium, sometimes even with popularity; gilding with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation, a commendable deference for public opinion, or a laudable zeal for public good, the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption, or infatuation.

As avenues to foreign influence in innumerable ways, such attachments are particularly alarming to the truly enlightened and independent patriot. How many opportunities do they afford to tamper with domestic factions, to practice the arts of seduction, to mislead public opinion, to influence or awe the public councils!—Such an attachment of a small or weak, towards a great and powerful nation, dooms the former to be the satellite of the latter.

Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence, (I conjure you to believe me fellow citizens,) the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake; since history and experience prove, that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial, else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defense against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike for another, cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side, and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other. Real patriots, who may resist the intrigues of the favorite, are liable to become suspected and odious; while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people, to surrender their interests.

The great rule of conduct for us, in regard to foreign nations, is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith:—Here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests, which to us have none, or a very remote relation. Hence, she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves by artificial ties, in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon, to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation, when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?

It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliance with any portion of the foreign world; so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it; for let me not be understood as capable of patronizing infidelity to existing engagements. I hold the maxim no less applicable to public than private affairs, that honesty is always the best policy. I repeat it, therefore, let those engagements be observed in their genuine sense. But in my opinion, it is unnecessary, and would be unwise to extend them.

Taking care always to keep ourselves by suitable establishments, on a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

Harmony, and a liberal intercourse with all nations, are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand; neither seeking nor granting exclusive favors or preferences; consulting the natural course of things; diffusing and diversifying by gentle means the streams of commerce, but forcing nothing; establishing with powers so disposed, in order to give trade a stable course, to define the rights of our merchants, and to enable the government to support them, conventional rules of intercourse, the best that present circumstances and mutual opinion will permit, but temporary, and liable to be from time to time abandoned or varied as experience and circumstances shall dictate; constantly keeping in view, that it is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another; that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character; that by such acceptance, it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favors, and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more. There can be no greater error than to expect, or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation. It is an illusion which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard.

In offering to you, my countrymen, these counsels of an old and affectionate friend, I dare not hope they will make the strong and lasting impression I could wish; that they will control the usual current of the passions, or prevent our nation from running the course which has hitherto marked the destiny of nations, but if I may even flatter myself that they may be productive of some partial benefit, some occasional good; that they may now and then recur to moderate the fury of party spirit, to warn against the mischiefs of foreign intrigue, to guard against the impostures of pretended patriotism, this hope will be a full recompense for the solicitude for your welfare by which they have been dictated.

How far, in the discharge of my official duties, I have been guided by the principles which have been delineated, the public records and other evidences of my conduct must witness to you and to the world. To myself, the assurance of my own conscience is, that I have, at least believed myself to be guided by them.

In relation to the still subsisting war in Europe; my proclamation of the 22d of April, 1793, is the index to my plan. Sanctioned by your approving voice, and by that of your representatives in both houses of congress, the spirit of that measure has continually governed me, uninfluenced by any attempts to deter or divert me from it.

After deliberate examination, with the aid of the best lights I could obtain, I was well satisfied that our country, under all the circumstances of the case, had a right to take, and was bound, in duty and interest, to take a neutral position. Having taken it, I determined, as far as should depend upon me, to maintain it with moderation, perseverance and firmness.

The considerations which respect the right to hold this conduct, it is not necessary on this occasion to detail. I will only observe that, according to my understanding of the matter, that right, so far from being denied by any of the belligerent powers, has been virtually admitted by all.

The duty of holding a neutral conduct may be inferred, without any thing more, from the obligation which justice and humanity impose on every nation, in cases in which it is free to act, to maintain inviolate the relations of peace and amity towards other nations.

The inducements of interest for observing that conduct will best be referred to your own reflections and experience. With me, a predominant motive has been to endeavor to gain time to our country to settle and mature its yet recent institutions, and to progress, without interruption, to that degree of strength, and consistency which is necessary to give it, humanly speaking, the command of its own fortunes.

Though in reviewing the incidents of my administration, I am unconscious of intentional error, I am nevertheless too sensible of my defects not to think it probable that I may have committed many errors. What ever they may be, I fervently beseech the Almighty to avert or mitigate the evils to which they may tend. I shall also carry with me the hope that my country will never cease to view them with indulgence; and that, after forty-five years of my life dedicated to its service, with an upright zeal, the faults of incompetent abilities will be consigned to oblivion, as myself must soon be to the mansions of rest.

Relying on its kindness in this as in other things, and actuated by that fervent love towards it, which is so natural to a man who views in it the native soil of himself and his progenitors for several generations; I anticipate with pleasing expectation that retreat in which I promise myself to realize, without alloy, the sweet enjoyment of partaking, in the midst of my fellow citizens, the benign influence of good laws under a free government—the ever favorite object of my heart, and the happy reward, as I trust, of our mutual cares, labors and dangers.

SENATE

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1937

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Spirit of holiness and grace, turn not Thou away as we bring before Thee the sin and disorder of our souls, beset by vain imaginings and the shame of the earthly mind.

Shine Thou into our souls with Thy splendor, before which every vileness must shrink away, that with clarity of vision, made possible by the hoarded thoughtfulness of earnest years, we may revere the majesty of Thy gifts and day by day grow in faith, in charity and self-denial, and in purity of heart by which we may see Thee and attain unto the larger life of love. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. ROBINSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Monday, February 22, 1937, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

CALL OF THE ROLL

CROP INSURANCE—NOTICE OF HEARINGS

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, I announce that on Thursday of the present week at 10 o'clock there will begin hearings on the so-called crop-insurance bill, being Senate bill 1397, before a subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I should like to have printed in the body of the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, a copy of the bill and a copy of a statement which I have prepared in connection with it.

There being no objection, the bill and statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1397

A bill to create a Federal Crop Insurance Corporation, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That it is the purpose of this act to promote the national welfare by alleviating the economic distress caused by wheat-crop failures due to drought and other causes, maintaining the purchasing power of farmers, and providing for stable supplies of wheat for domestic consumption and the orderly flow thereof in interstate commerce.

SEC. 2. To carry out the purposes of this act there is hereby created a body corporate with the name "Federal Crop Insurance Corporation" (herein called the Corporation). The principal office of the Corporation shall be located in the District of Columbia, but there may be established agencies or branch offices elsewhere in the United States under rules and regulations prescribed by the Board of Directors. This act may be cited as the Federal Crop Insurance Act.

SEC. 3. (a) The Corporation shall have a capital stock of $100,000,000 subscribed by the United States of America, payment for which shall be subject to call in whole or in part by the Board of Directors of the Corporation.

(b) There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000,000 for the purpose of subscribing to said stock.

(c) Receipts for payments by the United States of America for or on account of such stock shall be issued by the Corporation to the Secretary of the Treasury and shall be evidence of the stock ownership by the United States of America.

SEC. 4. (a) The management of the Corporation shall be vested in a Board of Directors (hereinafter called the Board) subject to the general supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture. The Board shall consist of three persons employed in the Department of Agriculture who shall be appointed by and hold office at the pleasure of the Secretary of Agriculture.

(b) Vacancies in the Board so long as there shall be two members in office shall not impair the powers of the Board to execute the functions of the Corporation, and two of the members in office shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of the business of the Board.

(c) The directors of the Corporation appointed as hereinbefore provided shall receive no additional compensation for their services as such directors, but may be allowed actual necessary traveling and subsistence expenses when engaged in business of the Corporation outside of the District of Columbia.

(d) The Board shall select, subject to the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, a manager, who shall be the executive officer of the Corporation, with such power and authority as may be conferred upon him by the Board.

(c) The Board may establish or utilize committees or associations of producers in the administration of this act and make payments to such committees or associations to cover the estimated administrative expenses to be incurred by them in cooperating in carrying out this act and may provide that all or part of such estimated expenses may be included in the insurance premiums provided for in this act.

(d) The Board may allot to the bureaus and offices of the Department of Agriculture or transfer to such other agencies of the Federal and State Governments as it may request to assist in carrying out this act any funds available for the purposes of this act.

SEC. 7. To carry out the purposes of this act the Corporation is authorized and empowered—

(a) Commencing with the wheat crop planted for harvest in 1938, to insure, upon such terms and conditions not inconsistent with the provisions of this act as it may determine, producers of wheat against loss in yields of wheat due to drought, flood, hail, wind, tornado, insect infestation, plant disease, and such other causes as may be determined by the Board. Such insurance shall not cover losses due to the neglect or malfeasance of the producer. Such insurance shall cover a percentage, to be determined by the Board, of the recorded or appraised average yield of wheat on the insured farm for a representative base period subject to such adjustments as the Board may prescribe to the end that the average yields fixed for farms in the same area which are subject to the same conditions may be fair and just. The Board may condition the issuance of such insurance in any county or area upon a minimum amount of participation in a program of crop insurance formulated pursuant to this act.

(b) To fix premiums for such insurance, payable either in wheat or cash equivalent as of the due date thereof, on the basis of the recorded or appraised average crop loss of wheat on the insured farm for a representative base period subject to such adjustments as the Board may prescribe to the end that the premiums fixed for farms in the same area which are subject to the same conditions may be fair and just. Such premiums shall be collected at such time or times, in such manner, and upon such security as the Board may determine.

(c) To adjust and pay claims for losses either in wheat or in cash equivalent under rules prescribed by the Board. In the event that any claim for indemnity under the provisions of this act is denied by the Corporation an action on such claim may be brought against the Corporation in the district court of the United States in and for the district in which the insured farm is located, and exclusive jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon such courts to determine such controversies without regard to the amount in controversy: Provided, That no suit on such claim shall be allowed under this section unless the same shall have been brought within 1 year after the date when notice of denial of the claim is mailed to the claimant.

(d) From time to time, in such manner and through such agencies as the Board may determine, to purchase, handle, store, insure, provide storage facilities for, and sell wheat, and pay any expenses incidental thereto, it being the intent of this provision, however, that, insofar as practicable, the Corporation shall purchase wheat only at the rate and to a total amount equal to the payment of premiums in cash by farmers or to replace wheat sold to prevent deterioration; and shall sell wheat only to the extent necessary to cover payments of indemnities and to prevent deterioration. Wheat acquired under the provisions of this act shall be kept in federally bonded or State licensed warehouses or in such other manner as the Board determines will adequately protect the interests of the Corporation and the producers insured.

SEC. 8. Claims for indemnities under this act shall not be liable to attachment, levy, garnishment, or any other legal process before payment to the insured or to deduction on account of the indebtedness of the insured or his estate to the United States except claims of the United States or the Corporation arising under this act.

SEC. 9. All money of the Corporation not otherwise employed may be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States in any Federal Reserve bank, or in any other bank approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, subject to withdrawal by the Corporation at any time, or may be invested in obligations of the United States. The Federal Reserve banks are hereby authorized and directed to act as depositories, custodians, and fiscal agents for the Corporation in the performance of its powers conferred by this act.

SEC. 10. The Corporation, including its franchise, its capital, reserves, and surplus, and its income and property, shall be exempt from all taxation now or hereafter imposed by the United States or by any Territory, dependency, or possession thereof, or by any State, county, municipality, or local taxing authority.

SEC. 11. When designated for that purpose by the Secretary of the Treasury, the Corporation shall be a depository of public money, except receipts from customs, under such regulations as may be prescribed by said Secretary; and it may also be employed as a financial agent of the Government; and it shall perform all such reasonable duties, as a depository of public money and financial agent of the Government, as may be required of it.

SEC. 12. The Corporation shall at all times maintain complete and accurate books of account and shall file annually with the Secretary of Agriculture a complete report as to the business of the Corporation. The financial transactions of the Corporation shall be audited by the General Accounting Office at such times and in such manner as the Comptroller General of the United States may prescribe for the sole purpose of making a report to Congress, together with such recommendations as he may deem advisable.

SEC. 13. (a) Whoever makes any statement knowing it to be false, or whoever willfully overvalues any security, for the purpose of influencing in any way the action of the Corporation, or for the purpose of obtaining for himself or another money, property, or anything of value, under this act, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 2 years, or both.

(b) No person shall, while acting in any official capacity in the administration of this act, speculate, directly or indirectly, in any agricultural commodity or product thereof, to which this act applies, or in contracts relating thereto, or in the stock or membership interests of any association or corporation engaged in handling, processing, or disposing of any such commodity or product. Any person violating this subsection shall upon conviction thereof be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 2 years, or both.

(c) Whoever, being connected in any capacity with the Corporation, (1) embezzles, abstracts, purloins, or willfully misapplies any moneys, funds, securities, or other things of value, whether belonging to the Corporation or pledged or otherwise entrusted to it; or (2) with intent to defraud the Corporation, or any other body politic or corporate, or any individual, or to deceive any officer, auditor, or examiner of the Corporation, makes any false entry in any book, report, or statement of, or to, the Corporation or draws any order, or issues, puts forth, or assigns any note or other obligation or draft, mortgage, judgment, or decree thereof; or (3) with intent to defraud the Corporation, participates or shares in or receives directly or indirectly any money, profit, property, or benefits through any transaction, loan, commission, contract, or any other act of the Corporation, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or both.

(d) Whoever willfully shall conceal, remove, dispose of, or convert to his own use or to that of another, any property mortgaged or pledged to, or held by, the Corporation, as security for any obligation, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 2 years, or both.

(e) Whoever conspires with another to accomplish any of the acts made unlawful by the preceding provisions of this section shall, on conviction thereof, be subject to the same fine or imprisonment, or both, as is applicable in the case of conviction for doing such unlawful act.

(f) The provisions of sections 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, and 117 of the Criminal Code of the United States (U. S. C., title 18, secs. 202 to 207, inclusive) insofar as applicable, are extended to apply to contracts or agreements with the Corporation under this act: Provided, however, That the provisions of section 3741 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 41, sec. 22) and sections 114 and 115 of the Criminal Code of the United States shall not apply to any crop-insurance agreements made under this act.

SEC. 14. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to appoint from time to time an advisory committee, consisting of not more than five members experienced in agricultural pursuits and appointed with due consideration to their geographical distribution, to advise the Corporation with respect to carrying out the purposes of this act. The compensation of the members of such committee shall be determined by the Board but shall not exceed $10 per day each while actually employed and actual necessary traveling and subsistence expenses.

SEC. 15. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated and made available to the Corporation such sums, not in excess of $10,000,000 for any fiscal year, as may be necessary to cover the operating and administrative costs of the Corporation other than payments of claims for indemnities.

SEC. 16. The sections of this act and subdivisions of sections are hereby declared to be separable, and in the event any one or more sections or parts of the same of this act be held to be unconstitutional, the same shall not affect the validity of other sections or parts of sections of this act.

SEC. 17. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby reserved.

FEDERAL CROP INSURANCE

By Senator JAMES P. POPE

In Salt Lake City there stands an imposing monument to the seagull. It commemorates the occasion in June 1848 when the seagull saved the Mormon people from a disastrous attack on their crops by crickets. Since that time there have been serious invasions of crops in Utah and Idaho by these pests. They are now a serious threat to crops in that section.

On October 1, 1935, a blinding snowstorm with low temperatures hit the Northwestern States, freezing fruit on the trees, potatoes in the ground, and other crops for the first time so early in the season for 40 years. Other natural hazards to agriculture, such as drought and floods, have been unusually severe during the last few years. This has brought to the attention of many thoughtful people the problem of total or partial crop failures to individuals and to sections of our country due to these hazards.

One day a thrifty, hard-working farmer said to me: "Why is it that merchants, manufacturers, and nearly all others can insure their property against loss, even goods and ships may be insured against storms at sea, while the farmers can have no protection for their crops growing in the field? Why is it that all other property may be insured against damage, while crops in the field are denied insurance against fire, storms, waterspouts, frost, floods, noxious insects, and plant diseases? Does not the Government, which could insure the lives of soldiers in war, have enough ingenuity and regard for farmers to insure them against these disasters?

"This may be a new idea", he said, "but it ought to be done."

The fact is that insurance can be obtained against almost everything else. Insurance is available against loss by burglary, defalcation, war, unemployment, old age, and strikes. Lloyds has even insured against twins. Farmers would be glad to take care of their twins if they could obtain some protection for their crops.

The record of the Government in its insurance ventures has been remarkable. In 1914, shortly after the World War began, Mr. MCADOO asked Congress to organize an American Risk Insurance Bureau for insuring hulls and cargoes under the American flag. The total of the policies issued was $2,250,000,000. The premiums received amounted to $46,000,000, and the losses paid were $29,000,000, leaving a profit of $17,000,000. The expense of conducting this enormous business for 4 years was only $165,000, or a little over one-third of 1 percent upon the premiums received. When we remember that private insurance costs about 60 percent of the premium, this record of Government management seems remarkably efficient. Fifty thousand dollars was appropriated by the Government for working capital for this Bureau, but not a dollar was ever drawn, for the reason that the premiums received from the first exceeded the losses and expenses incurred.

I introduced a bill at the last session of Congress to authorize the Government to adopt a plan of crop insurance against extraordinary and unusual natural hazards. I have been discussing it throughout the country during the past year with good response.

Last summer the President appointed a committee to study the problem and to make recommendations. About a month ago this committee made its report—a very interesting report—with recommendations that legislation be enacted to give the Department of Agriculture authority to administer a crop-insurance program as to wheat. It was thought advisable by the committee to limit the insurance to wheat for two reasons: First, wheat farmers seemed to be very strongly in favor of it; and, second, the committee had obtained quite complete data on that commodity. A further reason appealed to the committee that since the program would be more or less experimental, it might be well to start with one commodity.

This committee discovered that the idea of crop insurance was not new at all. It is at least a half century old. As far back as 1888 a rather comprehensive report was made on this subject by a German economist to the Japanese Government. He pointed out then many of the factors that enter into such a plan. He said that private insurance of crops would probably be inadequate because of limited capital and limited area of operation; that the greater the area covered the more perfect would be the insurance; that the first requirement for general crop insurance is that it should spread over the whole country; that drought and wet years "occur more frequently in continuous succession of years than singly"; that years of good yield frequently succeed each other; that the quantity and quality of the yield depend both on men and on Nature.

It was further pointed out in this old report that insurance of yield on a large scale would be practical, but insurance of prices would be attended by much difficulty; that in years of large yield prices might be so low that income would be less than in years of poor yield.

Since that time some efforts have been made by private companies in this and other countries to insure crops in the field. These efforts, except as to hail, have resulted in failure for several reasons. First, the limited area in which the insurance was put into effect with a limited spread of the risk made it subject to the danger of serious crop failures for the first years of operation and disastrous loss to the companies. Second, attempts to insure income rather than yield losses alone proved disastrous; and, third, there was inadequate data for determining risk.

The President's committee, after obtaining data from the Bureau of Agricultural Economics as to average yields of wheat in the various States in the Union, recommended a plan of crop insurance to be effective for the 1938 crop; that the program be administered by the Department of Agriculture and integrated with other farm programs; that insurance be voluntary and limited to farmers participating in the soil-erosion program; that premiums be paid in wheat or cash equivalent at the time premiums are collected; that wheat so accumulated be stored as reserves; and that indemnities be paid in wheat or cash equivalent at the time of payment of such indemnities. The committee further recommended that only crop yields be insured without insurance of price; that only a designated percentage of the producer's average yield be insured; that determination of the premiums be made on the basis of both individual and regional loss experience.

A most important and interesting feature of such a plan would be the accumulation of substantial reserves of wheat during general good-yield years and the reduction of such reserves or surpluses during years of poor yield. For instance, a chart has been prepared which shows how this would have worked in the Great Plains area covering Montana, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, Oklahoma, and Texas. During the years 1930, 1931, and 1932 reserves of some 75,000,000 bushels, being the excess of premiums over indemnities, would have accumulated, and during the drought years of 1933, 1934, and 1935 the reserves would have vanished because of the excess of indemnities over premiums. During the first 3 years the value of the wheat received as premiums at the low prices then prevailing was some $60,000,000. During the last 3 years the value of the same wheat received as indemnities by the farmers was worth about $100,000,000, or $40,000,000 more. This prospect that the farmer may get some part of the benefit of increased prices is a novel one. Those who speculate in wheat usually get these benefits. The transfer from the speculator to the farmer is an experiment which I think the farmers would be delighted to try. It is generally true that in years of surplus production prices are low and in years of scant production prices are high. This means that the farmer, instead of the speculator, gets the benefit of increased prices in short-yield years when the bulk of indemnities will be paid.

The question is frequently asked: "Would not the accumulation of substantial reserves of wheat be a threat to the market?" It is thought not, for the reason that these reserves could not be placed on the market except as indemnities in wheat are received by the farmer and sold by him. This would clearly distinguish the method of disposition of these reserves from that of large accumulations acquired and held by the Farm Board.

This plan is new in that it combines the principle of insurance for the farmers' yields with the establishment of reserves that would tend to stabilize the available supply of wheat and give the farmer and consumer the benefit of it. It would reduce the fluctuations in market supplies and prices of wheat. Wheat would be taken off the market in years of good crops and surplus production, and would be put back on the market only in years of general poor crops and short production. The accumulation of reserves would automatically be regulated by crop insurance requirements.

Naturally, the question arises as to whether crop insurance should be a private or public enterprise. I have pointed out that private efforts in this regard have failed. They have failed because this is a larger enterprise than any company or group of companies would desire to undertake, and, too, the reserve feature of such a plan is not within the field of private insurance. It is clearly an undertaking for the Government.

This plan is not a substitute for any farm program now being administered. It is supplementary. It should be integrated with other programs.

Crop insurance should reduce to a considerable extent the necessity for seed and feed loans, drought loans, and similar relief. It should assist many wheat farmers to help themselves in emergencies. Because insurance would reduce the need for relief that has been afforded by Federal agencies, the Government would be justified in contributing toward the administration and storage costs in such a plan.

It is estimated that some $615,000,000 has been expended by the Federal Government during the past 10 years for agricultural relief. This figure does not include benefit payments under the Agricultural Adjustment Act. This means that an average of $61,000,000 a year during the past 10-year period has been spent by the Federal Government for farm relief. It is certainly reasonable to assume that a substantial part of this relief would be made unnecessary by an insurance program.

Crop insurance would be of value to banks, insurance companies, and other institutions extending farm credit. It would be of vital importance to the farmer in maintaining his credit.

Such a program would help to solve an age-old problem of the farmer. No other industry is so menaced by weather conditions as agriculture. None is so uncertain on account of natural hazards as well as prices that may be received. Back in 1914 Prof. Josiah Royce, of Harvard, wrote a remarkable essay entitled "War and Insurance." In it he said, "Floods, famines, pestilences, earthquakes, and volcanoes may interfere, in various fashions, with the economic as well as with the rest of the social life of the peoples thus afflicted. Apart from actual famines, a considerable failure of their crops may impair for a season the normal supplies of individual nations." He goes on to point out the necessity for insurance for the farmer as well as for others afflicted by these calamities.

It is the duty of the Government to establish a system of crop insurance to give the farmer that security to which he is entitled as the original producer of the necessaries of life for all mankind.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Catskill Peace Group, of Catskill, N. Y., favoring the enactment of neutrality legislation laying mandatory embargoes on arms and munitions of war, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Danby Grange, No. 1254, of Danby, N. Y., protesting against the modification of embargoes on shipments of livestock from any country harboring serious animal diseases, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Camillus Grange, No. 466, Patrons of Husbandry, of Camillus, N. Y., protesting against the ratification of the proposed child-labor amendment to the Constitution, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the New York Board of Trade, Inc., of New York City, protesting against the granting of power to the Department of Labor to subpena witnesses and records in labor disputes, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Advertising Club of Harlem, New York City, N. Y., favoring the issuance of a postage stamp bearing the likeness of President Franklin D. Roosevelt in connection with the New York World's Fair of 1939, Inc., which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I present a memorial signed by 79 members of the faculty of the University of Michigan, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Judiciary Committee.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We, the undersigned, members of the faculties of the University of Michigan, signing not as such but as citizens of the United States and of the State of Michigan, desire to record our opposition to the proposal of the President of the United States as contained in his message to Congress of February 5, 1937, and in the draft bill accompanying the same, by which it is contemplated drastically to change the organization, character, and operation of the Supreme Court of the United States.

We are opposed to this proposal for the following reasons:

1. It would destroy the historic independence of that Court guaranteed to us after centuries of struggle for constitutional liberty both in England and in America and recognized throughout our history as necessary for the protection of the States, indestructible in an indestructible union, of minorities, and of the personal and civil liberties of each individual citizen.

2. It seeks to accomplish, under the guise of apparent congressional authority, what would amount to an amending of the Constitution, by effectually modifying the tenure of the judiciary as now fixed therein. If the tenure of the judiciary is to be modified, it should be by means of orderly constitutional amendment, by which the people, from whom all political power proceeds, may have the opportunity to express their opinion.

3. It seeks to set an arbitrary age limit of 70 years upon Federal judicial tenure. Such a limitation would have deprived the country in times past of years of invaluable services rendered by all of the Chief Justices and many of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court since the days of Marshall, services rendered by men designated both as liberals and as conservatives.

4. It seeks to increase the membership from 9 to 15 under the claim that thereby the efficiency of the Court will be increased and greater despatch of business effected. The fact is that the Supreme Court is not now and has not been, for a number of years, behind in its work. As each case on appeal is heard before a full bench, no time can be gained by a larger Court, but, on the contrary, much time would be lost.

5. Under the guise of increasing the efficiency of the Federal court system, the proposal, if adopted, would enable the President to control the Supreme Court, so as to encroach upon the powers of that Court. The Constitution separates the departments of government and thereby guarantees liberty in providing "a Government of laws and not of men."

6. Under the guise of increasing the efficiency of the Court, the purpose is clearly to provide a means by which recent legislation, declared by the Supreme Court to be beyond the powers of Congress, may be reinstated and validated. The Constitution provides the only orderly method to accomplish this. Twice in our history the people by constitutional amendment have given or denied powers to the Government so as to overcome decisions of the Supreme Court. It is the function of the Supreme Court to declare what the supreme law is—only the people, by the amending process, can change it.

We therefore very earnestly urge upon you that you oppose the proposal to change the Supreme Court because we believe that such a change is revolutionary in spirit, if not in form; that it disturbs the established and desirable balance of powers in the Federal Government; that it greatly increases the powers of the President, inviting still further assaults upon the constitutional balance of powers; and that it encourages encroachments by the Executive and the creation of real despotism. It would be a change of government by usurpation in order to gain an immediate political advantage. "Though this in one instance", in the words of Washington, "may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed."

Mr. VANDENBERG also presented the petition of sundry students of the University of Michigan Law School, Ann Arbor, Mich., praying for a reorganization of the Federal district and circuit courts, and remonstrating against the enactment of legislation proposing to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petitions of Ironwood Miners' Union, No. 129, of Ironwood, and Local Union No. 38, International Union of United Brewery, Flour, Cereal, and Soft Drink Workers of America, of Detroit, both in the State of Michigan, praying for the enactment of the bill (S. 1392) to reorganize the judicial branch of the Government, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Detroit Bar Association and the Citizens Civic and Social Union, of Detroit, both in the State of Michigan, protesting against the enactment of the bill (S. 1392) to reorganize the judicial branch of the Government, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Grand Rapids Bar Association, of Grand Rapids; the Muskegon County Bar Association, of Muskegon; and the Kiwanis Club of Flint, all in the State of Michigan, protesting against the enactment of legislation proposing to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented two memorials, numerously signed, by sundry citizens of Detroit, Decker, Deford, Kingston, Marlette, and Snover, all in the State of Michigan, remonstrating against the enactment of the bill (S. 1392) to reorganize the judicial branch of the Government, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented five memorials, numerously signed, by sundry citizens of the State of Michigan, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation changing the number of Justices of the Supreme Court, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REORGANIZATION OF FEDERAL JUDICIARY

Mr. NORRIS. I present a copy of correspondence between Frank E. Gannett, president of the Gannett Newspapers, of Rochester, N. Y., and Dan V. Stephens, of Fremont, Nebr. I ask that the letter of Mr. Gannett and the reply of Mr. Stephens be printed in the RECORD and lie on the table.

There being no objection, the correspondence was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE GANNETT NEWSPAPERS,
Rochester, N. Y., February 12, 1937.

Mr. DAN V. STEPHENS,
Fremont, Nebr.

DEAR MR. STEPHENS: "There is no liberty if the power of judging be not separated from the legislative and Executive powers."

This was said while adoption of our Constitution was under discussion.

Today this principle is attacked and in danger, although its vital truth is as self-evident now as then. Life tenure was assured to judges because the founders of this Government knew that to preserve government under law, independence of the judiciary is indispensable.

The fight to protect our Supreme Court from subordination to the Executive can be won. It requires organization, national and local; immediate aggressive action—and enough money to carry the cost of awakening public opinion. I have joined with others in organizing a national nonpartisan, nonpolitical committee to carry on this fight.

1. Will you sign and circulate the attached petition?

2. Will you volunteer to help organize a nonpartisan local committee to cooperate with us in your own congressional district? The outcome in Congress will depend upon how well and quickly public opinion is mobilized in every congressional district and State. Will you protest to your Senators and Congressman at once, sending me a copy?

3. Will you make a contribution to help carry the expenses of a national organization?

Prompt mass action is essential. Please show this letter to friends and business associates. Enlist their cooperation with yours.

Please write me your suggestions and viewpoint and also return the enclosed blank by earliest mail.

Yours sincerely,

FRANK E. GANNETT.

FEBRUARY 15, 1937.

Mr. FRANK E. GANNETT,
Rochester, N. Y.

DEAR MR. GANNETT: In response to your favor of February 12 promoting a campaign against the people of the United States, which, of course, is not your proclaimed purpose, will say that I am not interested in promoting the campaign for the protection of the Supreme Court from the alleged Executive domination, which you refer to, because it is quite apparent that the Supreme Court is "out of step" with the country. The President was elected twice by an overwhelming majority on the issues of the New Deal, and the Supreme Court has prevented its realization to a large degree and continues to prevent it.

The opening paragraph of your letter states:

"There is no liberty if the power of judging be not separated from the legislative and Executive powers."

Admitting that abstractly the theory is correct, the facts are that all powers, broadly speaking, are now in the hands of the Supreme Court and it has usurped the functions of both the legislative and administrative branches of the Government. This is no longer a coordinated government of three branches.

If this country is a government by the people and for the people their sentiments were certainly expressed at the polls in two consecutive Presidential campaigns in favor of Roosevelt and the New Deal. Then how does it come that a patriotic gentleman like yourself can take the attitude that the Government should be turned over to the rule of five men on the Supreme Bench, who are so reactionary in their sentiments that it is impossible for the will of the people to be expressed through government?

Answering your questions categorically:

1. "Will you sign and circulate the attached petition?" I certainly will not. I would feel that I was unpatriotic and conspiring in the overthrow of my Government.

2. "Will you volunteer to help organize a nonpartisan local committee, etc., and protest to your Senators and Congressman?" I will not. On the contrary, I will urge our Congressmen and Senators to sustain the hands of the President in this fight against the usurpation of government by the Supreme Court.

3. "Will you make a contribution to help carry the expenses of a national organization?" I certainly will not. I would consider such a contribution a crime against my country, and, furthermore, the interests that are represented behind your movement (whether you represent them or not) have plenty of funds for this purpose—much more than the people have in the support of our Government.

I consider your letter one of the most offensive political letters I ever received, notwithstanding the fact that you did not intend it to be so. I consider it offensive in the sense that you are proposing to me a sort of conspiracy against a peoples' government as represented by two Presidential elections in a vote that has never been equaled in the history of the country.

You ask for my suggestions, and you have them, and I regret exceedingly that there are so many men like yourself in this country—learned men, men in strong positions—who represent views so inimical to the welfare of the common people.

Yours very truly,

DAN V. STEPHENS.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. PEPPER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 44) for the relief of Edward N. Jerry, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 116) thereon.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 294) for the relief of Elmer Blair, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 117) thereon.

Mr. McCARRAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2518) to provide for retirement of Justices of the Supreme Court, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 119) thereon.

Mr. BARKLEY, from the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 66) providing for the participation by the United States in the Greater Texas and Pan American Exposition to be held in the State of Texas during the year 1937, reported it without amendment.

POSTPONEMENT OF STAR-ROUTE CONTRACT AWARDS

Mr. McKELLAR. From the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads I report back favorably, with an amendment, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 84) to authorize the Postmaster General to withhold the awarding of star-route contracts for a period of 60 days. I ask that the joint resolution be read, and then I shall ask for its immediate consideration.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 84) to authorize the Postmaster General to withhold the awarding of star-route contracts for a period of 60 days, which had been reported from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads with an amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. My attention was diverted for a moment and I did not hear the joint resolution read. What is its purport?

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be glad to explain to the Senator the purpose of the joint resolution.

Some days ago a bill was reported from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads providing for continuation of the star-route contracts. The committee proposed an amendment which would give the Postmaster General authority to extend the contracts. That was not satisfactory. The time is very near when contracts will have to be advertised or otherwise disposed of. The joint resolution merely provides that the present contracts shall be continued for a period of 60 days, until the whole matter may be thrashed out by the committee and a proper report made. If the joint resolution is passed, I am going to ask permission to have the bill, which has already been reported, sent back to the committee for further consideration.

Mr. McNARY. I dislike, as the Senator knows, to legislate in this fashion. May I ask if the Republican members of the committee have considered the joint resolution and favor it?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] understands the situation and, I am sure, will be glad to explain it to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I believe the immediate consideration of the joint resolution would be advisable, because, as I understand, the Post Office Department must act quickly regarding the present contracts, which will expire on April 1, 1937, unless the joint resolution is passed. If the joint resolution is passed, then orderly consideration may be given to the various amendments and to the various measures before the Senate and House at this time relating to the subject. Passage of the joint resolution granting the extension of 60 days would allow ample opportunity to clear up the situation and would protect the star-route contractors whose contracts will expire on April 1. I favor the immediate passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. McNARY. In view of the statement of the Senator from New Hampshire, I have no objection to immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution which had been reported from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads with an amendment, in line 1, after the word "authorized", to insert the words "and directed", so as to make the joint resolution read:

That the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to withhold the awarding of any star-route contract for a period of 60 days after March 31, 1937.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McKELLAR. I now ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 740) to provide for the issuance of renewable 4-year-term contracts to qualified star-route contractors and subcontractors, and for other purposes, be recommitted to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads for further consideration and action.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMERICAN NEUTRALITY—REPORT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE (S. REPT. NO. 118)

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reports favorably, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, Senate Joint Resolution 51, proposing to amend the present neutrality law, and submits a report (No. 118) thereon. The present occupant of the chair asks unanimous consent that the joint resolution, as reported, and the accompanying report be published in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the joint resolution, as reported with an amendment, together with the report (No. 118), was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate Joint Resolution 51

Joint resolution to amend the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution providing for the prohibition of the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent countries; the prohibition of the transportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war by vessels of the United States for the use of belligerent states; for the registration and licensing of persons engaged in the business of manufacturing, exporting, or importing arms, ammunition, or implements of war; and restricting travel by American citizens on belligerent ships during war", approved August 31, 1935, being Public Resolution No. 67, Seventy-fourth Congress (S. J. Res. 173), as amended by joint resolution approved February 29, 1936, entitled "Joint resolution extending and amending the joint resolution (Public Resolution No. 67, 74th Cong.), approved August 31, 1935"

Resolved, etc., [That section 1 of the joint resolution (Public Resolution No. 67, 74th Cong., approved Aug. 31, 1935) as amended by Public Resolution No. 74, Seventy-fourth Congress, approved February 29, 1936, be, and the same is hereby, amended as follows, to wit: Insert the following paragraph after the first paragraph of section 1:

["Whenever the President shall find that a state of civil war exists in a foreign state and that such armed conflict is of a magnitude or is being conducted under conditions that the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war from the United States to said foreign state would threaten and endanger the peace of the United States, the President shall proclaim such fact, and it shall thereafter be unlawful to export arms, ammunition, or implements of war from any place in the United States, or possessions of the United States, to any part of such state or to any neutral port for transshipment to, or for use in, said state."

[In the last paragraph of said section 1 strike out the words "this section and all proclamations issued thereunder shall not be effective after May 1, 1937", and insert in lieu thereof "prior to the revocation of the proclamation or proclamations issued thereunder."

[Amend section 2, page 2, in the fourth line from the bottom of said page after the words "shall not be issued", add a new paragraph to read as follows, to wit:

["Whenever a proclamation or proclamations are issued, as provided in section 1 of this act, all licenses theretofore issued under the act shall, ipso facto, and immediately upon the issuance of such proclamation or proclamations, cease to grant authority to export arms, ammunition, or implements of war from any place in the United States, or possessions of the United States, to any port in said belligerent states or to such state wherein civil war has been declared by Presidential proclamation to exist or to any neutral port for transshipment to, or for use in, any belligerent country or for use in any country where civil war is proclaimed to exist; and said license or licenses, insofar as the grant of authority to export to such countries named in such proclamation or proclamations of the President, shall be null and void."

[Amend section 3 by inserting after the word "war" in line 5 of said section 3 the following words: "or to the state where civil war is proclaimed to exist", and by adding, after the word "country", in line 6, section 3, a comma in place of the period and the words "or within the state where civil war is proclaimed to exist."

[Amend section 6, in line 9, by striking out the word "belligerent", and striking out, in lines 8 and 9, the words "no citizen of the United States shall" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "and thereafter it shall be unlawful for any citizen of the United States to travel on any vessel of any nation declared in the proclamation provided for in section 1 of this act to be a belligerent or to be a state wherein civil war exists."

["SEC. 1 A. (a) Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation or proclamations as provided in section 1 of this act and he shall thereafter find that the placing of restrictions on the shipment of certain articles or materials in addition to arms, ammunition, and implements of war from the United States to said belligerent described in the proclamation issued under said section 1, or to a country wherein civil war has been proclaimed to exist, is deemed necessary to promote the security and preserve the peace or neutrality of the United States or to protect the lives and commerce of nationals of the United States, he shall so proclaim and it shall thereafter be unlawful for any American vessel to carry such articles or materials to any belligerent country or any country wherein civil war exists, named in said proclamation or proclamations issued under section 1 of this act, or to any neutral country for transshipment to, or for the use of, such belligerent countries or within such country where civil war exists.

["(b) The President shall by proclamation from time to time definitely enumerate said articles and materials which it shall be unlawful for American vessels to transport.

["(c) The President shall from time to time by proclamation extend such restrictions as are imposed under this section to other countries as and when they may be declared to become belligerents under proclamations issued under section 1 of this act.

["(d) The President may from time to time change, modify, or revoke in whole or in part any proclamations issued by him under this section."

["Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation or proclamations, as provided in section 1, it shall thereafter be unlawful for any American vessel other than vessels of war engaged in commerce with a belligerent country to be armed or to carry any armament, arms, ammunition, or implements of war except small arms and ammunitions therefor and other weapons as the President may publicly designate to be in possession of the officers of such vessels deemed by the President necessary for the preservation of discipline aboard such vessels and until said proclamation or proclamations are revoked."]

"That the joint resolution entitled 'Joint resolution providing for the prohibition of the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent countries; the prohibition of the transportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war by vessels of the United States for the use of belligerent states; for the registration and licensing of persons engaged in the business of manufacturing, exporting, or importing arms, ammunition, or implements of war; and restricting travel by American citizens on belligerent ships during war', approved August 31, 1935, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"'That (a) whenever the President shall find that there exists a state of war between, or among, two or more foreign states, the President shall proclaim such fact, and it shall thereafter be unlawful to export arms, ammunition, or implements of war from any place in the United States, or possessions of the United States, to any such belligerent state, or to any neutral state for transshipment to, or for the use of, a belligerent state.

"'(b) The President shall, from time to time, by proclamation, extend such embargo upon the export of arms, ammunition, or implements of war to other states as and when they may become involved in such war.

"'(c) Whenever the President shall find that a state of civil strife exists in a foreign state and that such armed conflict is of a magnitude or is being conducted under such conditions that the export of arms, ammunition, or implements of war from the United States to said foreign state would threaten or endanger the peace of the United States, the President shall proclaim such fact, and it shall thereafter be unlawful to export arms, ammunition, or implements of war from any place in the United States, or possessions of the United States, to any such state or to any other state for transshipment to, or for use in, the state named in the proclamation.

"'(d) The President, by proclamation, shall definitely enumerate the arms, ammunition, and implements of war, the export of which is prohibited by this act.

"'(e) Whoever, in violation of any of the provisions of this act, shall export, or attempt to export, or cause to be exported, arms, ammunition, or implements of war from the United States, or any of its possessions, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both, and the property, vessel, or vehicle containing the same shall be subject to the provisions of sections 1 to 8, inclusive, title 6, chapter 30, of the act approved June 15, 1917 (40 Stat. 223–225; U. S. C., title 22, secs. 238–245).

"'(f) In the case of the forfeiture of any arms, ammunition, or implements of war by reason of a violation of this act, no public or private sale shall be required; but such arms, ammunition, or implements of war shall be delivered to the Secretary of War for such use or disposal thereof as shall be approved by the President of the United States.

"'(g) When in the judgment of the President the conditions which have caused him to issue his proclamation have ceased to exist, he shall revoke the same and the provisions hereof shall thereupon cease to apply.

"'(h) Except with respect to offenses committed, or forfeitures incurred prior to the revocation of the proclamation or proclamations issued thereunder, said proclamations shall become ineffective after revocation.

"'SEC. 2. (a) Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation or proclamations as provided in section 1 of this act and he shall thereafter find that the placing of restrictions on the shipment of certain articles or materials in addition to arms, ammunition, and implements of war from the United States to said belligerents named in the proclamation issued under said section 1, or to a country wherein civil strife has been proclaimed to exist, is deemed necessary to promote the security or preserve the peace or neutrality of the United States or to protect the lives and commerce of nationals of the United States, he shall so proclaim and it shall thereafter be unlawful for any American vessel or aircraft to carry such articles or materials to any belligerent country, or any country wherein civil strife exists, named in said proclamation or proclamations issued under section 1 of this act, or to any other country for transshipment to, or for the use of, such belligerent countries or within such country where civil strife exists. The President shall by proclamation from time to time definitely enumerate said articles and materials which it shall be unlawful for American vessels or aircraft to transport.

"'(b) It shall be unlawful to export or transport to any belligerent country, or to any country wherein civil strife exists, named in said proclamation or proclamations issued under section 1 of this act, or to any other country for transshipment to, or for the use of, such belligerent country or such country wherein civil strife exists, any articles or materials whatever until all right, title, and interest therein shall have been transferred to some foreign government, agency, institution, association, partnership, corporation, or national. The shipper of such article shall be required to file with the collector of the port from which the articles or materials are to be exported a declaration under oath that there exists in American citizens no right, title, or interest in such articles or materials, and to comply with such rules and regulations as shall be promulgated by the President. Any such declaration so filed shall be a conclusive estoppel against any claim of any American citizen of right, title, or interest in such articles or materials. Insurance written by American underwriters on any articles or materials, the exportation of which is prohibited by this act, or on articles carried by an American vessel or aircraft contrary to subsection (a) of this section shall not be deemed an American interest therein, and no insurance policy issued on such articles or materials and no loss incurred thereunder shall be made a basis of any claim put forward by the Government of the United States.

"'(c) The President shall from time to time by proclamation extend such restrictions as are imposed under subsection (a) of this section to other countries as and when they may be declared to become belligerents under proclamations issued under section 1 of this act.

"'(d) The President may from time to time change, modify, or revoke in whole or in part any proclamations issued by him under subsection (a) of this section.

"'SEC. 3. (a) Whenever the President shall have issued his proclamation or proclamations as provided for in section 1 of this act, it shall thereafter during the period of the war or civil strife be unlawful for any person within the United States to purchase, sell, or exchange bonds, securities, or other obligations of the government of any belligerent country or country wherein civil strife exists, or of any political subdivision thereof, or of any person acting for or on behalf of such government, issued after the date of such proclamation, or to make any loan or extend any credit to any such government or person: Provided, That if the President shall find that such action will serve to protect the commercial or other interests of the United States or its nationals, he may, in his discretion, and to such extent and under such regulation as he may prescribe, except from the operation of this section ordinary commercial credits and short-time obligations in aid of legal transactions and of a character customarily used in normal peacetime commercial transactions.

"'(b) The provisions of this section shall not apply to a renewal or adjustment of such indebtedness as may exist on the date of the President's proclamation.

"'(c) Whoever shall violate the provisions of this section or of any regulations issued hereunder shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $50,000 or imprisoned for not more than 5 years, or both. Should the violation be by a corporation, organization, or association, each officer or agent thereof participating in the violation may be liable to the penalty herein prescribed.

"'(d) When the President shall have revoked his proclamation as provided for in section 1 of this act, the provisions of this section and of any regulations issued by the President hereunder shall thereupon cease to apply.

"'SEC. 4. This act shall not apply to an American republic or republics engaged in war against a non-American state or states, provided the American republic is not cooperating with a non-American state or states in such war.

"'SEC. 5. (a) For the purposes of this act—

"'(1) The term "Board" means the National Munitions Control Board which is hereby established to carry out the provisions of this act. The Board shall consist of the Secretary of State, who shall be chairman and executive officer of the Board; the Secretary of the Treasury; the Secretary of War; the Secretary of the Navy; and the Secretary of Commerce. Except as otherwise provided in this act, or by other law, the administration of this act is vested in the Department of State;

"'2. The term "United States", when used in a geographical sense, includes the several States and Territories, the insular possessions of the United States (including the Philippine Islands), the Canal Zone, and the District of Columbia;

"'(3) The term "person" includes a partnership, company, association, or corporation, as well as a natural person.

"'(b) Every person who engages in the business of manufacturing, exporting, or importing any of the arms, ammunition, or implements of war referred to in this act, whether as an exporter, importer, manufacturer, or dealer, shall register with the Secretary of State his name, or business name, principal place of business, and places of business in the United States, and a list of the arms, ammunition, and implements of war which he manufactures, imports, or exports.

"'(c) Every person required to register under this section shall notify the Secretary of State of any change in the arms, ammunition, or implements of war which he exports, imports, or manufactures; and upon such notification the Secretary of State shall issue to such person an amended certificate of registration, free of charge, which shall remain valid until the date of expiration of the original certificate. Every person required to register under the provisions of this section shall pay a registration fee of $500, unless he manufactured, exported, or imported arms, ammunition, and implements of war to a total sales value of less than $50,000 during the 12 months immediately preceding his registration, in which case he shall pay a registration fee of $100. Upon receipt of the required registration fee, the Secretary of State shall issue a registration certificate valid for 5 years, which shall be renewable for further periods of 5 years upon the payment for each renewal of a fee of $500 in the case of persons who manufactured, exported, or imported arms, ammunition, and implements of war to a total sales value of more than $50,000 during the 12 months immediately preceding the renewal, or a fee of $100 in the case of persons who manufactured, exported, or imported arms, ammunition, and implements of war to a total sales value of less than $50,000 during the 12 months immediately preceding the renewal. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to refund, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $400 to every person who shall have paid a registration fee of $500 pursuant to this act, who manufactured, exported, or imported arms, ammunition, and implements of war to a total sales value of less than $50,000 during the 12 months immediately preceding his registration.

"'(d) It shall be unlawful for any person to export, or attempt to export, from the United States any of the arms, ammunition, or implements of war referred to in this act to any other country or to import, or attempt to import, to the United States from any other country any of the arms, ammunition, or implements of war referred to in this act without first having obtained a license therefor.

"'(e) All persons required to register under this section shall maintain, subject to the inspection of the Board, such permanent records of manufacture for export, importation, and exportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war as the Board shall prescribe.

"'(f) Licenses shall be issued to persons who have registered as provided for, except in cases of export or import licenses where exportation of arms, ammunition, or implements of war would be in violation of this act or any other law of the United States, or of a treaty to which the United States is a party, in which cases such licenses shall not be issued.

"'(g) Whenever a proclamation or proclamations are issued, as provided in section 1 of this act, all licenses theretofore issued under the act, shall ipso facto, and immediately upon the issuance of such proclamation or proclamations, cease to grant authority to export arms, ammunition, or implements of war from any place in the United States, or possessions of the United States, to any port in said belligerent states or to such state wherein civil strife has been declared by Presidential proclamation to exist or to any other country for transshipment to, or for use in, any belligerent country or for use in any country where civil strife is proclaimed to exist; and said licenses, insofar as the grant of authority to export to such countries named in such proclamation or proclamations of the President is concerned, shall be null and void.

"'(h) The Board shall be called by the chairman and shall hold at least one meeting a year.

"'(i) No purchase of arms, ammunition, or implements of war shall be made on behalf of the United States by any officer, executive department, or independent establishment of the Government from any person who shall have failed to register under the provisions of this act.

"'(j) The provisions of the act of August 29, 1916, relating to the sale of ordnance and stores to the Government of Cuba (39 Stat. 619, 643; U. S. C., title 50, sec. 72), are hereby repealed as of December 31, 1937.

"'(k) The Board shall make an annual report to Congress, copies of which shall be distributed as are other reports transmitted to Congress. Such reports shall contain such information and data collected by the Board as may be considered of value in the determination of questions connected with the control of trade in arms, ammunition, and implements of war. It shall include a list of all persons required to register under the provisions of this act, and full information concerning the licenses issued hereunder.

"'(l) The Secretary of State shall promulgate such rules and regulations with regard to the enforcement of this section as he may deem necessary to carry out its provisions.

"'(m) The President is hereby authorized to proclaim upon recommendation of the Board from time to time a list of articles which shall be considered arms, ammunition, and implements of war for the purposes of this section.

"'SEC. 6. (a) Whenever the President shall issue a proclamation provided for in section 1 of this act, thereafter it shall be unlawful for any American vessel or aircraft to carry any arms, ammunition, or implements of war to any port of the belligerent countries named in such proclamation as being at war, or to the state where civil strife is proclaimed to exist, or to any neutral port for transshipment to, or for the use of, a belligerent country, or within the state where civil strife is proclaimed to exist.

"'(b) Whoever, in violation of the provisions of this section, shall take, attempt to take, or shall authorize, hire, or solicit another to take any such vessel or aircraft carrying such cargo out of port or from the jurisdiction of the United States shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both; and, in addition, such vessel or aircraft, her tackle, apparel, furniture, equipment, and the arms, ammunition, and implements of war on board shall be forfeited to the United States.

"'(c) When the President finds the conditions which have caused him to issue his proclamation have ceased to exist, he shall revoke his proclamation, and the provisions of this section shall thereupon cease to apply.

"'SEC. 7. Whenever, during any war in which the United States is neutral, the President, or any person thereunto authorized by him, shall have cause to believe that any vessel or aircraft, domestic or foreign, whether requiring clearance or not, is about to carry out of a port of the United States, or its possessions, men or fuel, arms, ammunition, implements of war, or other supplies to any warship, tender, or supply ship of a foreign belligerent nation, but the evidence is not deemed sufficient to justify forbidding the departure of the vessel or aircraft as provided for by section 1, title V, chapter 30, of the act approved June 15, 1917 (40 Stat. 221; U. S. C., title 18, sec. 31), and if, in the President's judgment, such action will serve to maintain peace between the United States and foreign nations, or to protect the commercial interests of the United States and its citizens, or to promote the security of the United States, he shall have the power and it shall be his duty to require the owner, master, or person in command thereof, before departing from a port of the United States, or any of its possessions, for a foreign port, to give a bond to the United States, with sufficient sureties, in such amount as he shall deem proper, conditioned that the vessel or aircraft will not deliver the men, or the cargo, or any part thereof, to any warship, tender, or supply ship of a belligerent nation; and if the President, or any person thereunto authorized by him, shall find that a vessel or aircraft, domestic or foreign, in a port of the United States, or one of its possessions, has previously cleared from such port during such war and delivered its cargo or any part thereof to a warship, tender, or supply ship of a belligerent nation, he may prohibit the departure of such vessel or aircraft during the duration of the war.

"'SEC. 8. Whenever, during any war in which the United States is neutral, the President shall find that special restrictions placed on the use of the ports and territorial waters of the United States, or of its possessions, by the submarines or armed merchant vessels of a foreign nation will serve to maintain peace between the United States and foreign nations, or to protect the commercial interests of the United States and its citizens, or to promote the security of the United States, and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall thereafter be unlawful for any such submarine or armed merchant vessels to enter a port or the territorial waters of the United States or any of its possessions, or to depart therefrom, except under such conditions and subject to such limitations as the President may prescribe. When, in his judgment, the conditions which have caused him to issue his proclamation have ceased to exist, he shall revoke his proclamation and the provisions of this section shall thereupon cease to apply.

"'SEC. 9. Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation or proclamations as provided in section 1 of this act it shall be unlawful thereafter for any citizen of the United States to travel on any vessel or aircraft of the nation or nations named in the proclamation or proclamations issued pursuant to section 1 of this act, unless in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President shall prescribe: Provided, however, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to a citizen traveling on a vessel or aircraft whose voyage was begun in advance of the date of the President's proclamation, and who had no opportunity to discontinue his voyage after that date: And provided further, That they shall not apply under 90 days after the date of the President's proclamation to a citizen returning from a foreign country to the United States or to any of its possessions. When, in the President's judgment, the conditions which have caused him to issue his proclamation have ceased to exist, he shall revoke his proclamation and the provisions of this section shall thereupon cease to apply.

"'SEC. 10. Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation or proclamations as provided in section 1, it shall thereafter be unlawful for any American vessel engaged in commerce with a belligerent country or a country wherein civil strife is proclaimed to exist to be armed or to carry any armament, arms, ammunition, or implements of war except small arms and ammunitions therefor and other weapons as the President may publicly designate to be in possession of the officers of such vessels deemed by the President necessary for the preservation of discipline aboard such vessels and until said proclamation or proclamations are revoked.

"'SEC. 11. In every case of the violation of any of the provisions of this act where a specific penalty is not herein provided, such violator or violators, upon conviction, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both.

"'SEC. 12. If any of the provisions of this act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstance, is held invalid, the remainder of the act, and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby.

"'SEC. 13. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated from time to time, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such amounts as may be necessary to carry out the provisions and accomplish the purposes of this act.

"'SEC. 14. The President shall promulgate such rules and regulations not inconsistent with the provisions of this act as he shall deem necessary for the administration and enforcement of the provisions of this act.'"

AMENDMENTS TO THE NEUTRALITY ACT

Mr. PITTMAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, submitted the following report (to accompany S. J. Res. 51):

The Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate, having had under consideration Senate Joint Resolution 51, introduced by Senator PITTMAN on January 22, 1937, and referred to the committee, herein report back to the Senate the said resolution with the recommendation that it do pass.

The committee also had under consideration at the same time Senate Joint Resolution 60, introduced by Senators CLARK, BONE, VANDENBERG, and NYE on February 1, 1937, also Senate Joint Resolution 47, introduced by Senator THOMAS of Utah on January 19, 1937, and the bill (S. 1249) introduced by Senator LEWIS on February 1, 1937.

Senate Joint Resolution 51 does not in any material respect amend or change the existing law as stated in Public, No. 67, Seventy-fourth Congress, as amended, except to strike out the limitations on the life of the act of May 1, 1937, and to make the legislation permanent.

Senate Joint Resolution 51, however, does add several provisions to the existing law. It does extend the provisions of the existing law to foreign states wherein civil strife exists of such a magnitude and conducted under such conditions that the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war from the United States to said foreign state would threaten and endanger our peace. This is an addition to section 1 of the existing law.

Section 2 adds three new provisions to the existing law. In subsection (a) it is provided that the President may designate articles in addition to arms, ammunition, and implements of war that may not be transported upon American ships from the United States to belligerents when he deems it necessary to make such restrictions to promote the security or preserve the peace or neutrality of the United States or to protect the lives and commerce of the nationals of the United States.

Under subsection (c) of section 2 it is provided that "The President may from time to time change, modify, or revoke, in whole or in part, any proclamations issued by him under subsection (a) of this section." It is not anticipated that the President will use the authority to place such restrictions on American ships unless necessary, and only as to such articles the transportation of which would threaten the destruction of the vessel. He should, therefore, have the power granted in subsection (c) of section 2.

Subsection (b) of section 2 not only applies to American ships but to all ships engaged in the transportation of any articles and materials exported from the United States to belligerent countries. It provides that no article or material shall be so transported "until all right, title, and interest therein shall have been transferred to some foreign government, agency, institution, association, partnership, corporation, or national." The shipper is required to make affidavit that such title has been transferred, and to otherwise prove the same in accordance with the rules and regulations that may be prescribed by the President. This subsection (b) has chiefly for its purpose the limitation of all possibility of a controversy arising with regard to the alleged illegal destruction of property of American citizens. This provision preserves the property of our citizens, but does not sufficiently tend to preserve the lives of our citizens on the high seas. The fact that belligerents are notified that American ships are not exporting to belligerents certain materials will tend to induce such belligerents to refrain from sinking such ships without providing for the safety of the lives of those on board.

There is also another provision in section 2 with reference to insurance companies. This does not prohibit the writing of insurance, nor does it attempt to declare any insurance unlawful and void. It does provide, however, that insurance written by American underwriters on any articles or materials, the exportation of which is prohibited, or on articles carried on American vessels or aircraft contrary to subsection (a) of section 2, shall not be deemed an interest therein and shall not be made a basis of any claim put forward by the Government of the United States.

Section 2 of the existing law, being section 5 of Senate Joint Resolution 51, dealing with the question of registration and licensing of exporters and importers, has been changed only in that the registration fee is reduced from $500 to $100 for small exporters, and also by providing that upon the issuance of the proclamation contained in section 1 with regard to embargoes on arms, ammunition, and implements of war, any license theretofore issued for such exports or for the export of additional articles prohibited under subsection (a) of section 2, shall ipso facto, and immediately upon the issuance of such proclamation or proclamations cease to grant authority to so export such articles or materials.

Section 2 of the existing law, being section 5 of Senate Joint Resolution 51, is amended by repealing the act of August 29, 1916, relating to the sale of ordnance and stores to the Government of Cuba. This amendment is to repeal a law that is no longer deemed necessary or desirable.

Section 8 of Senate Joint Resolution 51, which is section 5 of the existing law, amends such section by including armed merchant vessels with submarines of a foreign nation. By this amendment the President can also restrict such armed merchant vessels to enter our ports under such conditions and subject to such limitations as he may prescribe. It is strongly contended by eminent writers upon international law that as a small cannon mounted on a merchant ship may sink a submarine on the surface with one shot that arm no longer has the character of a defensive weapon solely, but becomes a weapon of offense as far as submarines are concerned; that, therefore, a merchantman so armed betakes of a character of a vessel of war. In any future war it may be necessary for our Government to take cognizance of such question if and when raised.

Section 6 of the existing law, which is section 9 of Senate Joint Resolution 51, is amended by making it unlawful for citizens of the United States to travel upon belligerent vessels unless in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe. This simply eliminates the necessity for the President proclaiming that citizens shall not travel on belligerent ships. The provision simply goes into effect when the President shall make his proclamation as provided under section 1 of the existing law.

Section 10 of Senate Joint Resolution 51 is an entirely new provision. It makes it unlawful for American merchant vessels engaged in commerce with belligerents to be armed for offensive or defensive purposes.

Section 14 is a new provision, and grants to the President of the United States the power to make such rules and regulations not inconsistent with the provisions of the act as he shall deem necessary for the administration and enforcement of its provisions.

The chairman of the committee was authorized and directed to include in one amendment the existing law and the proposed amendments included in Senate Joint Resolution 51. This procedure was adopted because it enables the Senate to better understand the effect of the proposed amendments, and also because the entire law upon the enactment of the amendment will be found in one act.

The chairman has also been authorized to change numbers of the sections and subsections of Senate Joint Resolution 51, as reported out of the committee, so that the entire resolution, when finally enacted, may be so numbered as to be easily followed and referred to in debate and in the consideration of amendments that may be subsequently offered to any section or subsection of the act.

Under the procedure adopted with regard to the hearings held in executive session on February 13, 1937, such hearings are to be made public upon submitting the report of the committee. While the hearings are short and will be reported to the Senate at the same time with this report and be available to each Senator, it may be proper in this report to quote some of the testimony before the committee on behalf of the State Department, on page 4, as follows:

"The CHAIRMAN. * * * Have you read this composite print, Mr. Moore?

"Assistant Secretary MOORE. Yes.

"The CHAIRMAN. Have you anything you wish to say with regard to it?

"Assistant Secretary MOORE. Only generally this: That no measure proposed or sponsored by the administration has been introduced in the Senate or in the House, but the State Department has been very anxious to be of any assistance possible; and quite subsequent to the introduction of Senator PITTMAN's bill, and the bill introduced by Senator VANDENBERG and others, and the bills introduced by Senator THOMAS and Senator LEWIS, this matter has been discussed a good deal, and we are looking primarily at the joint resolution to which the chairman of the committee has just referred.

"It seemed to us that if it is assumed that Congress is likely to enact legislation pretty much of the same character as that now on the statute books, this joint resolution would prove perhaps as desirable and as workable as any other, with the changes which Senator PITTMAN has just indicated.

"It seems to me that fundamentally, substantially, the Pittman measure and the Vandenberg joint resolution are not very different. I do not think the original Pittman joint resolution or the one with these changes which have been discussed this morning fails to accomplish what is designed by the Vandenberg joint resolution."

In discussing the difference in the provisions with reference to "cash and carry" in the Clark et al. joint resolution and the Pittman joint resolution, the respective sections were read. The Pittman resolution requires that the title shall be transferred out of the citizen before any shipment to any belligerent or for the use of any belligerent was made.

The Clark resolution required that such transfers of title be made, not when the goods were being shipped to a belligerent, but when "transversing those waters adjacent to a belligerent state which are within the zone of belligerent operations as determined by the President * * *." The following colloquy took place:

"The CHAIRMAN. The only material distinction I see there is the zone proposition. The provision does not prohibit, as I read it, transportation to a belligerent. Such transportation is controlled by the zone through which it would have to go. The zone might include neutral countries.

"I may say that personally I have always opposed the proposition of establishing zones. It is an attempt at blockade, I suppose.

"Senator BORAH. Does this undertake to say that a person may not assert any right, title, or interest in any commodity which he has heretofore owned because of his undertaking to ship it?

"The CHAIRMAN. I think that is it.

"Assistant Secretary MOORE. To come down to the question of the provision relative to zones, the practical difficulty is that a great war zone would change so constantly and rapidly it would be impossible to administer such a provision.

"Senator VANDENBERG. I think that is very doubtful language.

"The CHAIRMAN. I am not trying to prevent shipments to neutral countries.

"Senator VANDENBERG. I do not think this is intended to, either.

"The CHAIRMAN. But it is capable of doing it.

"Senator VANDENBERG. I rather think it is.

"The CHAIRMAN. Where a zone is marked out on the high seas on a map, it is very difficult to tell ships where it is. You cannot have flags on the corners of it, and a person going to Morocco may casually drop into that zone for a few hundred miles and not know it.

"Senator VANDENBERG. I think that is it."

The following excerpt is quoted from pages 16 and 17 of the hearings:

"Senator VANDENBERG. Do I understand, Judge Moore, that the Pittman joint resolution, as amended this morning, substantially meets with your approval?

"Assistant Secretary MOORE. Yes; if it is assumed that we could not get an amendment along the line of the opinion of the Court to which I have referred. I have looked at Senator THOMAS' joint resolution, and, as I understand it, he makes even the arms provision permissive.

"Senator THOMAS of Utah. Yes.

"Assistant Secretary MOORE. He makes that permissive. He has a more flexible joint resolution than the Pittman measure, looking at that one feature.

"Being a practical man, and my understanding being that in all human probability the Congress is going to retain that mandatory provision, I say the Pittman joint resolution would, as I understand it, be fairly satisfactory."

The resolution reported by the committee rewrites the joint resolution of August 31, 1935, as amended, and for the convenience of the Senate the amendments to existing law made by the resolution as reported are indicated below. Existing law is shown in roman type; existing law proposed to be eliminated is shown in black brackets; matter proposed to be added is shown in italic type.

"Joint resolution providing for the prohibition of the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent countries; the prohibition of the transportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war by vessels of the United States for the use of belligerent states; for the registration and licensing of persons engaged in the business of manufacturing, exporting, or importing arms, ammunition, or implements of war, and restricting travel by American citizens on belligerent ships during war

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, [Whenever] That (a) whenever the President shall find that there exists a state of war between, or among, two or more foreign states, the President shall proclaim such fact, and it shall thereafter be unlawful to export arms, ammunition, or implements of war from any place in the United States, or possessions of the United States, [to any port of such belligerent states, or to any neutral port for transshipment to, or for the use of, a belligerent country.] to any such belligerent state, or to any neutral state for transshipment to, or for the use of, a belligerent state.

"(b) The President shall, from time to time, by proclamation, extend such embargo upon the export of arms, ammunition, or implements of war to other states as and when they may become involved in such war.

"(c) Whenever the President shall find that a state of civil strife exists in a foreign state and that such armed conflict is of a magnitude or is being conducted under such conditions that the export of arms, ammunition, or implements of war from the United States to said foreign state would threaten or endanger the peace of the United States, the President shall proclaim such fact, and it shall thereafter be unlawful to export arms, ammunition, or implements of war from any place in the United States, or possessions of the United States, to any such state or to any other state for transshipment to, or for use in, the state named in the proclamation.

"(d) The President, by proclamation, shall definitely enumerate the arms, ammunition, [or] and implements of war, the export of which is prohibited by this act.

"(e) Whoever, in violation of any of the provisions of this [section] act, shall export, or attempt to export, or cause to be exported, arms, ammunition, or implements of war from the United States, or any of its possessions, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both, and the property, vessel, or vehicle containing the same shall be subject to the provisions of sections 1 to 8, inclusive, title 6, chapter 30, of the act approved June 15, 1917 (40 Stat. 223–225; U. S. C., title 22, secs. 238–245).

"(f) In the case of the forfeiture of any arms, ammunition, or implements of war by reason of a violation of this act, no public or private sale shall be required; but such arms, ammunition, or implements of war shall be delivered to the Secretary of War for such use or disposal thereof as shall be approved by the President of the United States.

"(g) When in the judgment of the President the conditions which have caused him to issue his proclamation have ceased to exist he shall revoke the same, and the provisions hereof shall thereupon cease to apply.

"(h) Except with respect to offenses committed, or forfeitures incurred prior to [May 1, 1937, this section and all proclamations issued thereunder shall not be effective after May 1, 1937] the revocation of the proclamation or proclamations issued thereunder, said proclamations shall become ineffective after revocation.

"Sec. 2. (a) Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation or proclamations as provided in section 1 of this act and he shall thereafter find that the placing of restrictions on the shipment of certain articles or materials in addition to arms, ammunition, and implements of war from the United States to said belligerents named in the proclamation issued under said section 1, or to a country wherein civil strife has been proclaimed to exist, is deemed necessary to promote the security or preserve the peace or neutrality of the United States or to protect the lives and commerce of nationals of the United States, he shall so proclaim, and it shall thereafter be unlawful for any American vessel or aircraft to carry such articles or materials to any belligerent country, or any country wherein civil strife exists, named in said proclamation or proclamations issued under section 1 of this act, or to any other country for transshipment to, or for the use of, such belligerent countries or within such country where civil strife exists. The President shall by proclamation from time to time definitely enumerate said articles and materials which it shall be unlawful for American vessels or aircraft to transport.

"(b) It shall be unlawful to export or transport to any belligerent country, or to any country wherein civil strife exists, named in said proclamation or proclamations issued under section 1 of this act, or to any other country for transshipment to, or for the use of, such belligerent country or such country wherein civil strife exists, any articles or materials whatever until all right, title, and interest therein shall have been transferred to some foreign government, agency, institution, association, partnership, corporation, or national. The shipper of such article shall be required to file with the collector of the port from which the articles or materials are to be exported a declaration under oath that there exists in American citizens no right, title, or interest in such articles or materials, and to comply with such rules and regulations as shall be promulgated by the President. Any such declaration so filed shall be a conclusive estoppel against any claim of any American citizen of right, title, or interest in such articles or materials. Insurance written by American underwriters on any articles or materials, the exportation of which is prohibited by this act, or on articles carried by an American vessel or aircraft contrary to subsection (a) of this section shall not be deemed an American interest therein, and no insurance policy issued on such articles or materials and no loss incurred thereunder shall be made a basis of any claim put forward by the Government of the United States.

"(c) The President shall from time to time by proclamation extend such restrictions as are imposed under subsection (a) of this section to other countries as and when they may be declared to become belligerents under proclamations issued under section 1 of this act.

"(d) The President may from time to time change, modify, or revoke in whole or in part any proclamations issued by him under subsection (a) of this section.

"SEC. [1a] 3. (a) Whenever the President shall have issued his proclamation or proclamations as provided for in section 1 of this act, it shall thereafter during the period of the war or civil strife be unlawful for any person within the United States to purchase, sell, or exchange bonds, securities, or other obligations of the government of any belligerent country or country wherein civil strife exists, or of any political subdivision thereof, or of any person acting for or on behalf of such government, issued after the date of such proclamation, or to make any loan or extend any credit to any such government or person: Provided, That if the President shall find that such action will serve to protect the commercial or other interests of the United States or its nationals, he may, in his discretion, and to such extent and under such regulations as he may prescribe, except from the operation of this section ordinary commercial credits and short-time obligations in aid of legal transactions and of a character customarily used in normal peacetime commercial transactions.

"(b) The provisions of this section shall not apply to a renewal or adjustment of such indebtedness as may exist on the date of the President's proclamation.

"(c) Whoever shall violate the provisions of this section or of any regulations issued hereunder shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $50,000 or imprisoned for not more than 5 years, or both. Should the violation be by a corporation, organization, or association, each officer or agent thereof participating in the violation may be liable to the penalty herein prescribed.

"(d) When the President shall have revoked his proclamation as provided for in section 1 of this act, the provisions of this section and of any regulations issued by the President hereunder shall thereupon cease to apply.

"SEC. [1b] 4. This act shall not apply to an American republic or republics engaged in war against a non-American state or states, provided the American republic is not cooperating with a non-American state or states in such war.

"SEC. [2. That for] 5. (a) For the purposes of this act—

The Board shall consist of the Secretary of State, who shall be chairman and executive officer of the Board; the Secretary of the Treasury; the Secretary of War; the Secretary of the Navy; and the Secretary of Commerce. Except as otherwise provided in this act, or by other law, the administration of this act is vested in the Department of State;

"(c) Every person required to register under this section shall notify the Secretary of State of any change in the arms, ammunition, [and] or implements of war which he exports, imports, or manufactures; and upon such notification the Secretary of State shall issue to such person an amended certificate of registration, free of charge, which shall remain valid until the date of expiration of the original certificate. Every person required to register under the provisions of this section shall pay a registration fee of $500, [and upon receipt of such fee the Secretary of State shall issue a registration certificate valid for 5 years, which shall be renewable for further periods of 5 years upon the payment of each renewal of a fee of $500] *unless he manufactured, exported, or imported arms, ammunition, and implements of war to a total sales value of less than $50,000 during the 12 months immediately preceding his registration, in which case he shall pay a registration fee of $100. "(d) It shall be unlawful for any person to export, or attempt to export, from the United States any of the arms, ammunition, or implements of war referred to in this act to any other country or to import, or attempt to import, to the United States from any other country any of the arms, ammunition, or implements of war referred to in this act without first having obtained a license therefor.

"(e) All persons required to register under this section shall maintain, subject to the inspection of the Board, such permanent records of manufacture for export, importation, and exportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war as the Board shall prescribe.

"(f) Licenses shall be issued to persons who have registered as provided for, except in cases of export or import licenses where exportation of arms, ammunition, or implements of war would be in violation of this act or any other law of the United States, or of a treaty to which the United States is a party, in which cases such licenses shall not be issued.

"(g) Whenever a proclamation or proclamations are issued, as provided in section 1 of this act, all licenses theretofore issued under the act, shall ipso facto, and immediately upon the issuance of such proclamation or proclamations, cease to grant authority to export arms, ammunition, or implements of war from any place in the United States, or possessions of the United States, to any port in said belligerent states or to such state wherein civil strife has been declared by Presidential proclamation to exist or to any other country for transshipment to, or for use in, any belligerent country or for use in any country where civil strife is proclaimed to exist; and said licenses, insofar as the grant of authority to export to such countries named in such proclamation or proclamations of the President is concerned, shall be null and void.

"(h) The Board shall be called by the Chairman and shall hold at least one meeting a year.

"SEC. [7] 11. In every case of the violation of any of the provisions of this act where a specific penalty is not herein provided, such violator or violators, upon conviction, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 5 years or both.

"Sec. 14. The President shall promulgate such rules and regulations not inconsistent with the provisions of this act as he shall deem necessary for the administration and enforcement of the provisions of this act."

Mr. LEWIS subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the report submitted today by the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee touching the joint resolution known as the neutrality resolution, and the joint resolution itself, be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order has already been made.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, in connection with the so-called neutrality joint resolution, which has been reported favorably by the Committee on Foreign Relations, I desire to have printed, as a part of my remarks in the RECORD, a statement as to just what the joint resolution contains as set forth by Raymond Clapper in the Washington Daily News of Monday, February 22. Members of the committee believe that it is a very accurate and a very concise statement of just what the joint resolution contains, and I think it will be very informative to the country.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Daily News of Feb. 22, 1937]

UNITED STATES NEUTRALITY COMPROMISE PLAN DESTINED TO BE LANDMARK—PITTMAN PROPOSAL INVOLVES REVOLUTIONARY DEPARTURE FROM OUR PAST CONDUCT AS NEUTRAL AND ABANDONS ALL ATTEMPT TO DEVISE COMPLETE OR PARTIAL EMBARGOES AGAINST SUPPLIES, OTHER THAN ARMS

By Raymond Clapper

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee has agreed upon a compromise neutrality or peace program. This measure probably will be brought up in the Senate this week and is likely to go on the statute books with little change.

The resolution, to be known as the Peace Act of 1937, bearing the name of Senator PITTMAN, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee seems destined to be a landmark. It involves a revolutionary departure from our past conduct as a neutral.

Essential provisions of the Pittman measure are these:

1. Continuation of existing provisions for mandatory embargo on shipments of arms and ammunition to all belligerents or factions in civil strife.

2. Discretionary power to the President to list additional materials which American ships would be prohibited from transporting to any belligerent.

3. No materials shall be allowed to leave the country until all ownership and interest in them has been transferred to the foreign purchaser.

4. Mandatory embargo on all loans or credits to all belligerents, although the President may except short-term commercial credits used in normal peace-time transactions.

5. Mandatory prohibition upon any American vessel carrying arms and ammunition into any belligerent port.

6. Discretionary authority for the President to prevent American ports from being used as supply stations for belligerent vessels.

7. Mandatory prohibition on American citizens traveling on vessels or aircraft of belligerents.

8. Mandatory prohibition upon arming of American merchant vessels that go into belligerent ports.

Thus the program essentially is based on the "cash and carry" policy and upon keeping American citizens and their interests out of the line of fire.

This is not exactly the policy that the State Department would like. The Pittman measure is built entirely upon the purpose of isolating Americans from trouble. It is indifferent as to the merits of the respective belligerents and is concerned entirely with keeping the United States out of the fight. Many in the State Department have felt that the United States should cooperate with other nations against the aggressor. The Pittman program, theoretically, treats all belligerents alike.

Practically, it would not work out quite that way, particularly in event of a general European war, because our raw materials and other supplies, aside from direct arms and ammunition, would be available to those who could come and get them and pay for them. In such a line-up of powers as is taking place in Europe, our policy would therefore favor Great Britain, or whatever group of powers held the sea power.

The Pittman plan abandons all attempts to devise complete or partial embargoes against supplies, other than direct arms and ammunition, which are flatly embargoed. Considering the intense controversy over this subject, and the danger that under pressure of potential war orders such embargoes might not hold, the Pittman measure probably rests upon a more secure foundation in permitting the trade, but at the foreign purchaser's risk.

BORAH and HIRAM JOHNSON are against the policy. They say it means giving up freedom of the seas, that historic doctrine which says that American citizens have the right to wander at will through the fire lines of a world war, peddling their goods, and guaranteeing safe delivery.

On the other hand, the Pittman program has the support of several diverse groups in the Senate who take the view that modern wars being what they are, we must curtail the activities of our traveling salesmen or else be preparing to back them up by getting into foreign wars.

TAXES UPON CARRIERS AND THEIR EMPLOYEES

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Morning business is closed.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 212) to amend the act entitled "An act to levy an excise tax upon carriers and an income tax upon their employees, and for other purposes", approved August 29, 1935.

The joint resolution extends until June 30, 1938, the tax upon the employers and employees which is provided for in the railroad-retirement bill. Unless action is taken in the meantime the tax will expire the 28th of this month, and should be extended. It is a tax of 3½ percent on railroad employers and employees. The committee proposes to extend the tax until June 30, 1938.

I may say in explanation that the Supreme Court ruled against the first act and Congress passed another one. I understand the representatives of the railroads and the four brotherhoods involved have about agreed in the matter, but the agreement has not yet been signed by all concerned. However, we are assured that it will be signed. Both sides are very anxious to have the tax continued. There is no opposition from any source. The joint resolution is reported unanimously from the Finance Committee.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the joint resolution on the calendar is Order of Business 112, is it not?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes. It has passed the House.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, may we have the clerk read the joint resolution at this juncture?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read as requested.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 212), as follows:

Resolved, etc., That section 12 of the act entitled "An act to levy an excise tax upon carriers and an income tax upon their employees, and for other purposes", approved August 29, 1935, is amended by striking out "February 28, 1937" and inserting in lieu thereof "June 30, 1938."

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I am in receipt of communications, which I do not have on my desk at the moment, from certain elements of railroad employees in my city and State saying peace has been declared or something of a harmonious program agreed upon between themselves and their employers with reference to this measure. I am authorized to say there is no contest over it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Mississippi that he have his report on the joint resolution published in the RECORD in connection with the passage of the measure?

Mr. HARRISON. I ask unanimous consent that the report of the committee may be published in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the report (No. 112) was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 212) to amend the act entitled "An act to levy an excise tax upon carriers and an income tax upon their employees, and for other purposes", approved August 29, 1935, having considered the same fully, report favorably thereon without amendment and recommend that the joint resolution do pass.

This joint resolution passed the House of Representatives on February 15, 1937. Under section 12 of the above-entitled act the taxes imposed by the act, unless extended, will expire by limitation upon February 28, 1937. It is the purpose of this joint resolution to extend the levy of such taxes up to and including June 30, 1938.

It was not contemplated that these taxes would be allowed to expire, and the time limitation was placed in the original bill so that the rate of tax might be adjusted after investigation. Such investigation is not completed; and since the revenue is urgently needed, it is proposed at this time to extend the levy of the taxes to the end of the fiscal year 1938. It is expected that before that date the necessary data will have been made available to enable the Congress to determine the rate of tax which it will be necessary permanently to impose in order to raise the amount of revenue required.

The purposes of this joint resolution are fully explained in a letter from the Under Secretary of the Treasury, excerpts from which are incorporated herein and made a part of this report, as follows:

"Under section 12 of the act of August 29, 1935 (49 Stat. 974, U. S. C., title 45, ch. 9, sec. 252), hereinafter referred to as the 'Carriers' Taxing Act', the taxes imposed by that act on carriers, their employees, and the representatives of such employees terminate on February 28, 1937.

"Section 12 of that act provides as follows:

"'The taxes imposed by this act shall not apply to any compensation received or paid after February 28, 1937.'

"There is no time limitation, however, on the payment of the retirement benefits to such employees and representatives under the provisions of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935 (49 Stat. 967, U. S. C., title 45, ch. 10).

"It thus appears that although there will be continuing demands on the Treasury for the payment of those pensions after February 28, 1937, the revenues to satisfy those demands will cease on that date. The following amendment extending to June 30, 1938, the period for the collection of the taxes has been passed by the House:

"'Resolved, etc., That section 12 of the act entitled "An act to levy an excise tax upon carriers and an income tax upon their employees, and for other purposes", approved August 29, 1935, is amended by striking out "February 28, 1937", and inserting in lieu thereof "June 30, 1938."'

"In the above proposal June 30, 1938, is suggested as the extended date instead of February 28, 1938. The question of a further extension may again arise next year, and if the extended date is June 30, 1938, Congress will have more time to act. February 28, 1938, is so soon after Congress meets that there is danger that Congress might not act in time to extend the collection of the taxes, with consequent embarrassment to the Treasury Department.

"In connection with the above proposal, the following brief discussion may be helpful as background.

"The Carriers' Taxing Act was introduced as H. R. 8652. When the bill was reported from the Committee on Ways and Means (Aug. 22, 1935, H. Rept. No. 1882, 74th Cong., 1st sess.) it contained the provision (sec. 12) that the taxes imposed should not apply to any compensation received or paid after February 28, 1937. The reason for that provision does not appear anywhere in the record, but Mr. L. H. Parker, of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, advises that it is his recollection that the committee members were dissatisfied with the rate of tax prescribed, since they had no adequate information upon which to base a sound judgment. The limitation was accordingly written into the law in order to insure that the matter would again be considered by Congress. It was thought that meanwhile an investigation could be made (probably by the Commission to which reference is hereafter made) and facts procured upon which a proper rate could be based.

"The Railroad Retirement Act of 1935 was introduced as H. R. 8651. The House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, in reporting the bill (Aug. 3, 1935, H. Rept. No. 1171, 74th Cong., 1st sess.), included a provision providing for the creation of a Commission to investigate and report to Congress not later than January 1, 1936, upon the facts with reference to a railroad retirement annuity system. (See sec. 8 of the act.)

"Mr. Murray Latimer, Chairman of the Railroad Retirement Board, advises orally as follows: 'The Commission referred to above was appointed but functioned only perfunctorily. It made a report to Congress dated December 31, 1935, the gist of which is as follows:

"'"The Commission held its first meeting December 18, 1935, at Washington, D. C., and conducted successive meetings through December 31, conferring with members of the Railroad Retirement Board and representatives of railroad employees and railroad executives. The Commission has not found it possible to make such an investigation of the subject referred to it as would enable it by January 1, 1936, to submit recommendations which would be of value to the Congress.

"'"The Commission accordingly presents this report without recommendations."'

"The District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia in The Alton Railroad Co. et al. v. Railroad Retirement Board et al. (June 26, 1936, C. C. H. Unemployment Insurance Service, p. 8203) held the Carriers' Taxing Act to be unconstitutional and enjoined collection of the tax. That case is now pending on appeal before the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia but has not yet been set for argument.

"In the President's Budget message to Congress for the fiscal year 1937 it was estimated that $134,600,000 would be collected under the Carriers' Taxing Act. The following table discloses the amounts of assessments and payments under the act through December 31, 1936:

	Assessed	Paid
Carriers' tax and employees' tax	$1,364,185.23	$86,729.11
Representatives' tax	57,515.30	42,269.21
Total	1,421,700.53	128,998.32

"The foregoing amounts include approximately $4,000 of interest and penalties. For the two quarterly periods ended May 31, 1936, and August 31, 1936, a total of 758 returns of carriers were filed, and 3,808 returns of representatives were filed. Since August 31, 1936, small amounts of tax have been voluntarily paid, but the total collections are to date very little in excess of $200,000."

EXTENSION OF AUTHORITY TO NEGOTIATE TRADE AGREEMENTS

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 96) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended. The joint resolution, if enacted, would extend the President's authority to negotiate foreign-trade agreements for 3 years.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think in order to give parliamentary status to the measure the Senator should move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. HARRISON. Very well. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution in order that it may be made the unfinished business. I had thought perhaps that its consideration would not go beyond today.

Mr. McNARY. I think there is a possibility that it may.

Mr. HARRISON. Very well. I submit my motion to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution in order that it may be made the unfinished business of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 96) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, in presenting the original bill to the Senate in 1934 I discussed at some length the urgency of the situation requiring immediate steps to safeguard and expand our declining foreign trade, the terms of the bill, and the constitutional question of delegation of authority to the Executive to negotiate trade agreements. I shall not burden the Senate at this time with a full restatement of what I said on that occasion. I do, however, want to refresh the memories of Senators on two broad points.

First, I want to recall the seriousness of the situation that confronted us at that time. As was then pointed out, trade barriers throughout the world had been mounting at such a rapid pace that it appeared as if the nations of the world were literally vying with each other in a mad race for the elimination of all international trade.

The results had been disastrous. World trade had fallen to only about a third of its 1929 level, and our own foreign trade had fallen even lower. Between 1929 and 1933 we had lost six and one-half billion dollars' worth of foreign trade. Our share of declining world trade had fallen from nearly 14 percent to about 11 percent. It was clear that we were rapidly losing out, not only on account of the general decline in world trade but also because of a failure to maintain our former share of whatever trade there was. This decline in our foreign trade, together with the collapse of the domestic market, for which the shrinkage of our foreign trade was in no small degree responsible, had resulted in the complete prostration of agriculture and industry in this country and had left millions of workers on our farms and in our cities in idleness and distress.

Second, we pointed out that the exigencies of this situation required that our Government have at its disposal machinery for coping with it no less efficient than that of other countries. It was clear that there was urgent need for a grant by Congress to the Chief Executive of tariff-adjustment authority which would permit him to take prompt and effective action for the purpose of safeguarding and expanding our foreign trade. It was equally clear that a general downward revision of the tariff by Congress would not suffice, since that would have offered us no leverage with which to induce other countries to lower their barriers against our products.

It was in the light of this situation that we urged the Senate to approve the grant of authority to the Executive contained in the Trade Agreements Act. We did not then assume that this grant of authority would work wonders overnight toward restoring trade to its former levels, and we did not believe anyone familiar with the complexity and magnitude of the problem so assumed. No informed person could have failed to foresee the tremendous difficulties that would confront our negotiators in their efforts to stem the tide of declining trade and turn it back in the direction of a healthy expansion in the general interest of the country as a whole. Certainly there were no illusions about this matter on the part of those who were to be charged with this responsibility. From the very beginning they knew it was certain to be a long, hard fight against great odds. But there were no real alternatives. It was a challenge that had to be met without further delay.

Nearly 3 years have since passed. Considering the obstacles with which those in charge of the negotiations have had to contend, the results accomplished have, in my judgment, more than vindicated the trust which Congress reposed in the Executive in enacting this legislation. Of course, there is opposition and dissatisfaction in some quarters. There never was, and there never will be, a method of dealing with the tariff that will prevent that; and it goes without saying that mistakes may occasionally have been made. Nevertheless, I do not see how any reasonable person could give careful study to the testimony submitted to the House Ways and Means Committee and to the Senate Finance Committee on the renewal of this act without concluding that great progress has been made.

It is impossible, in the scope of my remarks, to review all of the evidence on this point; but I do want to call attention to some of the outstanding facts.

Trade agreements have been concluded with 16 countries, the two latest—with Costa Rica and El Salvador—not yet having gone into effect. The list, in order of signature, includes Cuba, Brazil, Belgium, Haiti, Sweden, Colombia, Canada, Honduras, the Netherlands, Switzerland, Nicaragua, Guatemala, France, Finland, Costa Rica, and El Salvador. Our trade with these countries accounted, in 1934, for 38 percent of our total foreign trade. In 1929 we had a $3,600,000,000 trade with them. In 1934, when the Trade Agreements Act was passed, it was down to one billion four hundred millions. In 1936, due to a number of causes, of which I readily concede that trade agreements was but one, it was up again to one billion nine hundred millions—an increase of one-half of a billion over 1934.

Now let us look at these agreements for the moment from the export side. What have our negotiators gotten for us? Let us pass momentarily over the question as to whether the concessions obtained from other countries have thus far resulted in large or small trade gains, and consider simply the concessions themselves.

After studying these agreements and the facts submitted in the course of the House and Senate hearings, I assert that the list of concessions obtained for products of our farms and factories is a highly impressive one. For example, take agriculture: We have obtained tariff reductions or other mitigations of trade barriers on farm products accounting for nearly a third of our 1929 exports of agricultural products to these 16 trade-agreement countries, and we have secured pledges of continuation of favorable trade treatment affecting nearly another third of our farm exports to these countries. Similar benefits have been obtained for manufactured products.

I wish there were time to delve into the list of concessions obtained and to discuss specific items, but if we were to pick out particular items it would seem to be emphasizing them at the expense of many others which I could not possibly mention. I do, however, desire to call the Senate's attention to the table in the Senate hearings on this joint resolution (pp. 11–13) containing a list of agricultural and industrial products benefited, and, with respect to each product, the number of agreements and the names of the countries in which concessions were obtained. The list is too long for me to go through here, but I ask permission to have it inserted at this point in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The list is as follows:

Mr. HARRISON. Moreover, I call attention to the fact that, while some of these concessions may have been of minor significance, by and large they have been real ones and not mere gestures. If anyone doubts that, let him examine the official releases given out upon the signing of each trade agreement, analyzing the agreement and comparing the new with the old rates. Let him also examine the report prepared by the Commerce Department last June, under the title "American Export Products Benefiting from Reciprocal Trade Agreements Signed Thus Far", which document was inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on July 1, 1936, as an extension of the remarks of Representative CITRON in the House on June 20. If he is interested simply in agricultural products, let him examine the data submitted by Representative BUCK in a speech in the House on March 30, 1936. He might also examine the relevant sections of a study entitled "The Midwest and the Trade Agreements Program", by Dr. H. S. Patton, which appears as one of the exhibits offered by Assistant Secretary of State Sayre in his recent testimony before the Ways and Means Committee on renewal of the Trade Agreements Act—see hearings, pages 258–278. No reasonable person could examine this evidence and fail to be impressed by the scope and magnitude of the concessions obtained on behalf of American agriculture and industry.

In order to obtain these concessions, it has been necessary for us to make concessions in return. That is as it should be. If we are to reduce trade barriers, we must do it all around. Even if foreign countries were foolish enough to grant us liberal concessions while requesting none in return, it would not be in our interest to operate on any such basis. There is much current nonsense about this matter. If we were to judge by the opposition that is fighting renewal of the Trade Agreements Act, we should have to assume that the Hawley-Smoot Act was an ideal piece of tariff legislation which should not be modified in any substantial particular, lest the welfare of this country be placed in jeopardy. These gentlemen talk about reciprocity, and some of them profess to believe in it, provided, however, that we grant no concessions to any other country on any product even remotely competitive with anything produced in the United States. They blandly assume that other countries will be willing to grant us concessions on products competing with their domestic industries, while our concessions to them are to be confined to wholly noncompetitive products.

The trouble with this theory is not only that it rests on a false assumption, but that in any event it would soon lead to an impasse, with little accomplished. Most of the wholly noncompetitive products, such as rubber, coffee, cocoa, and so forth, are already on our free list. Tariff negotiations limited to such articles could not get us very far. Despite the efforts of opponents of the program to muddy the waters, the fact is that, as a practical matter, we cannot hope to get far in reviving our exports on a stable basis without increasing our imports. Just how we are to increase imports if we confine negotiations to wholly noncompetitive articles that are already on the free list the die-hards fail to explain.

The truth is that this whole contention of the opposition is a sham and a snare. If our negotiators adhered rigidly to any such policy, we would get exactly nowhere. We would be able here and there, perhaps, to reduce a duty on something, but for all practical purposes we would be leaving the Hawley-Smoot Act intact in every essential particular. Of course, there are some who would desire that and this too, in spite of the overwhelming evidence of the sinister role played by Smoot-Hawleyism in aggravating and deepening the world depression, and in retarding economic recovery both at home and abroad. There may be a few who would not agree with me in that statement, but only a few.

The clue to this matter of effective tariff negotiation does not lie in confining action wholly to items that are not even remotely competitive with domestic production. That would condemn the program to sterility from the start. It consists rather in recognizing that there are scores of items where competition from imports is so limited and indirect, or so completely removed by prohibitive tariff rates, that tariff reductions can be made without material damage even to the domestic industries affected—indeed, to the ultimate gain of most of them—and to the great advantage of the country as a whole. Those of the opposition either fail to see or refuse to recognize this, but it is the truth just the same. They would rather shut out completely every product even remotely competitive with anything produced in the United States, even though they throw the whole economic life of the country out of gear and spoil the very markets at home which they profess to be safeguarding. Their memories refuse to go back even 5 years, and Senators know what the situation was then.

In the agreements thus far concluded, it is as plain as a pikestaff to anyone who will study the facts that our negotiators have been more than cautious in the matter of granting tariff reductions which might seriously injure any well-established American industry. The clamor set up by certain industries claiming serious injury is equaled only by the hollowness of their claims. It was surprising to me that so few criticisms might arise in relation to a law which has been in operation now for going on 3 years, and those criticisms only as to three or four products, which I shall discuss.

Not a single tariff reduction has been made without the most careful and painstaking examination of the relevant facts by qualified experts. The interdepartmental organization set up to administer the act commands the services of the best talent the Government can summon. Every private interest has been given full opportunity to be heard and present its claims, as provided in the act. If any mistakes have been made they have been made only after running the gamut of the most thoroughgoing procedure for acting in the light of complete information ever set up in our entire tariff history.

Recently the practice as to hearings has been modified. Heretofore our officials went into negotiations with the representatives of a foreign country, they held hearings, and people came here from various sections. Now, however, when the Government begins to negotiate with a foreign country, there is a public statement as to just what particular products are to be considered, and everyone who is interested in one of those products can come and be heard.

I was glad to see that step taken, because I think it is progressive, and that it broadens the opportunity for people to be heard. Some have said they did not know the administration was negotiating about this product or that product, but no one has made profert of himself before the committee, nor has anyone made an attempt to get any information from the committee relative to any hearing who failed to get it.

Mr. President, the following paragraphs are from the statement of Assistant Secretary of State Sayre before the Committee on Finance, particularly in connection with what I have just been saying. He stated:

> To open up trade channels trade barriers naturally must be reduced on both sides. This does not mean free trade. It does not mean throwing open the floodgates so as to allow the importation of great quantities of foreign goods which are highly competitive with our own. It does not mean, as some would have you believe, lessened home production in return for increased foreign production, nor lessened production in American industries for home consumption in return for increased production in American export industries. What it does mean is reducing on both sides such barriers as have no economic justification and cause injury rather than benefit to our Nation as a whole. If by the judicious and careful lowering of an unjustifiable trade barrier, we can increase our national trade without substantial injury to efficient domestic producers, both countries gain.

> The result is increased production in both countries, since the people of each desire more of the goods of the other. This has been our constant objective in the administration of the Trade Agreements Act.
> Thus, in return for concessions benefiting our exports, the United States has granted moderate tariff reductions, but not a single reduction has been made except after the fullest and most careful study of what would be its effects direct and indirect upon domestic industries. In the course of these studies elaborate reports have been prepared by governmental experts of the Tariff Commission, the Departments of Commerce, Agriculture, Treasury, and State. These have been painstakingly studied; and they have been supplemented by the views of interested private individuals, presented by word of mouth at public hearings, by briefs, or by less formal correspondence. In addition, constant conferences have been held and are daily being held between interested producers or business groups and officials in the various Government departments to discuss the effects of various proposals or possible tariff reductions with relation to their particular enterprise or business.

The men who have administered this program have acted with the utmost caution and discretion, as the record clearly shows. If we examine the concessions granted by us on non-agricultural products, we find that the bulk of them are either on products required by other industries and agriculture or else on specialties of which the domestic production is small or nonexistent. If we examine the concessions granted on agricultural products, we find that the number is small compared with those on manufactured products, and also as compared with the concessions obtained by us from other countries on farm products which we export. We find, also, that many of the agricultural products affected are not directly competitive with American farm products, and that not a few are items of which our farmers are themselves the purchasers; and we find that the concessions granted on the more competitive agricultural products are generally moderate and, in most cases, accompanied by strict limitations on the quantities to be admitted at the reduced rates or on the seasons when the reduced rates apply.

All the caution in the world, however, could not prevent agitation against many of these duty cuts. One would suppose from this agitation that important branches of industry or of agriculture were being forced to the wall by ruthless and ill-considered tariff reduction. Yet not a single representative of industry or agriculture appearing before the congressional committees hearing testimony on the proposed legislation even claimed, much less demonstrated, that his particular industry was worse off today than it was before the tariff was reduced. On this point their silence was loud and emphatic. The best any of them could do was to attempt to belittle what has been accomplished on the export side, and to seek to leave the impression that their own particular industries would have been better off than they now are had it not been for the duty reductions.

The exaggeration, and the unwarranted fears sought to be aroused, are illustrated by the claque that has been set up over agricultural imports. Because agricultural imports have been larger during the past 2 or 3 years than they were during the low depression years there has been insistent propaganda to make it appear that these imports were highly injurious to American agriculture and have been due in large measure to trade-agreement concessions. One might have supposed that this misleading propaganda, which has long since been thoroughly exposed, would have reached its peak during the Presidential campaign and would by now have subsided. But the testimony before the House and Senate committees and speeches in the House show that this is not the case.

Now, getting down to cattle, which is one of the items to which attention has been called, we are still being asked to believe that a duty reduction on 156,000 head of cattle, a reduction which still leaves the rate on these animals as high as under the Fordney-McCumber Act, had a highly detrimental effect on cattle prices, even though the number involved amounts to only three-fourths of 1 percent of our total annual slaughter. We still hear the charge that these shipments were seasonally concentrated, which was true to some extent. But nothing is said of the fact that it was 10 months before the quota was filled, or of the fact that the number coming in during the first half of the year could not in any case have had any material effect on the general level of cattle prices. We still hear that prices in particular markets were demoralized on particular days by large receipts from Canada, but not a word about the days when they were demoralized by large receipts of domestic animals, with few or none arriving from Canada—as if there were something peculiarly sinister about imported animals that makes them more disturbing to prices than any others. But not a word is said about the prices declining on some particular day because of large receipts of domestic cattle coming into some particular market.

The facts, as revealed before our committee, show that the prices declined more largely on that class of cattle which is produced in our country and not imported from Canada.

We do not hear that prices of cattle declined most in the spring of 1936 on high-grade domestic cattle of a type of which few are imported. We are not told that, at the rate of cattle importation from Canada in 1936, it would take nearly 30 years for as many to come in as the Federal Government bought up from the producers and took off their hands in a single year, during the 1934 drought.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I much prefer to finish my statement, and then I shall be glad to answer any questions Senators desire to ask.

Mr. FRAZIER. The Senator was making some rash statements about no farm organizations coming before the committee and protesting against the measure under discussion.

Mr. HARRISON. I did not say that, Mr. President.

Mr. FRAZIER. I know that representatives of farm organizations protested in the hearings before the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. The representatives of the National Grange were before our committee, and called our attention to the proposal concerning cattle.

Mr. FRAZIER. They also called attention to the decrease in the price of cattle after the Canadian treaty was entered into.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I made that statement, but I am stating that the facts do not show that they are justified in that contention. I do not know whether or not the Senator from North Dakota was here when the Fordney-McCumber Act was up for consideration.

Mr. FRAZIER. No; I was not.

Mr. HARRISON. I know that if ever there was a protectionist who adorned the House of Representatives, it was Brother Joe Fordney. He stated, in speech after speech, that there was no greater protectionist in the country than himself. He asserted that the tariff wall could not be built high enough. He would put a complete embargo on everything. It was under his leadership in the House and under the leadership of Senator McCumber in this body that a tariff was placed on cattle at just the rate that we placed in the Canadian agreement on certain kinds of cattle, and in addition we have now fixed a quota providing that not more than 156,000 cattle may come into this country in a year. So we are not trying to destroy anything.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand that the Senator has accepted the rates laid down by Representative Fordney as a basis for the present program?

Mr. HARRISON. No; Mr. President. I was merely answering the Senator from North Dakota and trying to refresh the memory of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I do not need to have my memory refreshed. I know what his view was. I am only surprised that the Senator has accepted Fordney's rule.

Mr. HARRISON. In connection with the Canadian agreement we accepted Fordney's rate on cattle; but, Mr. President, I would never accept Fordney's rule on tariffs.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I was not here when the Fordney-McCumber tariff bill was discussed, but I was here when the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill was under discussion. I remember very vividly that the Senator from Mississippi voted for a number of the high tariff rates contained in the Smoot-Hawley bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, Mr. President; on some of the agricultural products I voted for some high rates—much higher than could be justified. But the Senator appreciates that the bill was a Republican protective measure, and in the circumstances of the high rates being imposed on industrial products I thought agriculture should be fairly treated. The proposal concerning cattle was advanced by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], I think, and by certain cattle people, and I do not recall whether a record vote was taken; but in all probability, if there was, I probably voted for it.

Mr. President, we hear nothing about cattle prices today being well up toward twice what they were in 1932–33. We hear nothing of the fact that recovery of domestic purchasing power is a matter of particular significance to cattlemen, owing to the sharpness with which the demand for beef rises with increases in consumer incomes.

I know of no class of people more interested in the economic recovery of the country, in people being put to work, in industries running full time, than the cattle people, because the higher the wages that the laboring man gets, and the stronger the economic health of this country is, the more beef can be sold and the higher the prices that can be obtained therefor; and if we are helping in the general economic revival of the country by making some little concession to Canada permitting the importation of 156,000 head of a certain kind of cattle, far more is the cattleman helped and benefited by the general economic recovery that might in part be influenced by that concession.

We are simply expected to be foolish enough to believe that such slight additions to our cattle supplies as can be attributed to the highly safeguarded duty reduction in the Canadian agreement can have had any materially adverse effect on prices, and we are expected to ignore the increase in general purchasing power throughout the country to which the trade-agreements program is contributing. Small wonder that the Secretary of Agriculture, when asked, in testifying before the Finance Committee, whether, in his opinion, the cattle industry had been substantially injured, replied with an unqualified "No"; and no one will deny that the Secretary of Agriculture is about as good a friend to agriculture as could be found in the United States.

Most of the agitation with respect to other farm products is no better grounded. Take the case of the duty reduction on Cheddar cheese in the Canadian agreement. I call attention to that particular case because most of the harangue concerning the Canadian treaty has been in connection with dairy products.

Someone induced our friend, the late candidate for President on the Republican ticket, to discuss this question up in Michigan somewhere. I was delighted that wiser heads and closer advisers got him away from it just as quickly as they could.

The duty reduction on Cheddar cheese in the Canadian agreement did not prevent the domestic industry from selling more Cheddar, at higher prices, in 1936 than in 1935; it did not prevent producers from getting prices more than half again as high as they were getting in 1932; and it did not prevent the gross income of the industry from rising to about double what it was in 1932. Yet in 1932 practically no Cheddar was imported. Are we to conclude that the cheese producers would prefer to have 100 percent of a poor domestic market, as they had in 1932? Or would they prefer to have nearly 98 percent of a good market, as in fact they did have in 1936?

We might get excited over the reduction in the duty on cream, were it not for the fact that the amount coming in at the reduced rate of 35 cents a gallon is limited to 1,500,000 gallons, or about one-tenth of 1 percent of the cream equivalent of our total milk production. And lest that seem too alarming, let it further be noted that Canada filled less than 3 percent of this limited quota during 1936.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. DUFFY. My State happens to produce more cheese than all the other 47 States put together. There has been considerable dissatisfaction with the Canadian treaty because it reduced the rate on cheese, and I think it did result in increased importation of cheese from Canada to this country. I personally should have much preferred that the rate had not been reduced; but this is a comparison that I think could be made:

In 1929, when dairy prices were high, Wisconsin products sold to foreign countries amounted to $125,000,000; but in 1932, when our foreign trade was largely destroyed, the amount had decreased to only $14,000,000; and in that year there was practically no imports of cheese. It was while there was that decrease, when so many Wisconsin workmen were out of employment, that the price of cheese went down to its all-time low. So while there is perhaps seemingly some justification for complaint because more cheese did come in after the Canadian agreement, yet, taking the situation of the country as a whole, by increasing the purchasing power of people who purchase cheese and other dairy products, I think the net result was beneficial.

Mr. HARRISON. I thank the Senator from Wisconsin for his contribution. The thing that impressed me about the question was that in spite of the quota we gave to Canada, and the reduced rates, Canadian imports amounted to only 6 percent of that quota. Those were the facts presented to the committee.

Let us now get down to a proposition that I never heard of until recently, and I do not think many other Senators have. That has to do with the babassu nut. Of course the distinguished leader on the other side may have heard of that nut, becauses he raises and produces certain kinds of nuts; but in all this discussion concerning oil, when a few years ago we were trying to keep it from coming into our country, to keep it from coming into competition with our vegetable oil, and imposed a processing tax on this and that, and when everyone suggested the exclusion of every kind of oil they ever heard of, babassu-nut oil was not mentioned. It has always come into this country duty free. It is produced in Brazil. It is a very cheap product. We hear much of it now because there is some importation of babassu-nut oil.

Who would have supposed, until last autumn, that the fate of a national election——

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator after I shall have finished this sentence, because it is most interesting to the Senator from Pennsylvania. I repeat: Who would have supposed, until last autumn, that the fate of a national election—nay, of the Nation itself—would hinge upon this poor little unassuming nut?

I will now answer the Senator if I am able to do so.

Mr. DAVIS. Babassu oil is a substitute for coconut oil, is it not?

Mr. HARRISON. That I do not know. That may be very questionable. Due to the fact that oils in the United States have risen so high in price, due in large part to the embargo or the tax that has been placed on all kinds of oils, including copra, coconut oil, and other oils, the babassu nut, which is so cheap, the oil of which is so cheap, is now being imported into this country to some extent.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Is it not true that the testimony before the Finance Committee shows that the total importation of babassu-nut oil, compared to the total consumption of vegetable oils and fats is so small as to be infinitesimal and that the effect of its importation is inconsiderable when its price is compared with the price range of animal fats in this country?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I was going to come to that.

It seems that our tariff negotiators, hard pressed to find enough items on which to grant concessions to Brazil in return for the concessions obtained for American products, found babassu nuts on the free list and also without any excise tax which would be tantamount to a duty. During the past year, however, due to a relative domestic shortage and high prices of fats and oils—the result partly of reduced imports and reduced domestic supplies and partly of increased demand—babassu nuts have been imported. During 1936 the oil equivalent of the imports was 35,600,000 pounds, of which 16,000,000 pounds went into margarine, the rest probably into soap.

Babassu oil comprised about 5 percent of the oil used in making margarine during 1936. If not a pound had been so used, the production of margarine would probably have been about the same. And if not a pound of margarine had been produced, the price of butter probably would not have been increased by more than from 1 to 1½ cents a pound. Figure this out for yourselves, Senators. No wonder the Secretary of Agriculture was unable to suppress the smile which played over his stoic countenance when one of my distinguished fellow members of the Finance Committee asked him about babassu.

So far as concerns the balancing of concessions granted with concessions obtained, I do not see how anyone can doubt for one moment, after examining the actual contents of the 16 agreements thus far negotiated, that our negotiators have done a good job. This is true of the concessions as a whole. It is no less striking when we come to balance agricultural concessions obtained against those granted. To be sure, any such balancing is an inadequate test of the significance of the trade agreements for agriculture, because it takes no account of gains from better markets at home in consequence of increased employment and enhanced purchasing power resulting from industrial concessions obtained from other countries. But, even on that basis, the balance is heavily on the side of concessions obtained for farm exports.

All this relates to the concessions as such. Now, what about the results? Here, Senators, is where the "phoney" business starts on the part of those who are out to belittle and discredit what has been done. These objectors have learned to play on three strings—one tune for each string. But the tunes they play are always based on the same theme; namely, that our negotiators have been outbargained by the wily foreigners and have merely sold our industries and our agriculture "down the river" for a mess of pottage. The first tune is a funeral march to the effect that the trade-agreements program is largely responsible for the decline in our export balance—excess of exports over imports—in 1936 to a relatively small net figure, a development assumed to be ominously sinister for the national welfare. The second tune is a medley, a sort of statistical hodgepodge, in which, by resort to all manner of hocus-pocus, it is sought to create the impression that nothing substantial has been accomplished through trade agreements toward expanding export outlets for American products. The third tune is that well-known bucolic strain to the effect that agriculture has not been benefited in the aggregate by these agreements and stands to gain little or nothing in the future—that the interests of the farmer are being sacrificed.

Fortunately the first of these bogeys has been so thoroughly exploded in the report of the Ways and Means Committee on the pending joint resolution—see pages 4 to 7—that I need not dwell on it at great length. It so happens that our exports in 1936, which totaled some $2,453,000,000, were $171,000,000 larger than in 1935, but that our imports, amounting to some $2,419,000,000, were $372,000,000 larger than in 1935. The result was that our net export balance declined to some $34,000,000. Seizing upon the widespread but false notion that it is in the interest of the United States always to have the largest possible export balance—or so-called favorable balance—opponents of the trade-agreements program have sought to spread alarm concerning this development and to fix a large measure of responsibility for it upon trade agreements.

The report of the Ways and Means Committee, together with the testimony of Assistant Secretary of State Sayre, effectively disposes of this trade-balance myth. It shows that, while the trade agreements tended to stimulate both imports and exports, there is no evidence that they fostered imports to any greater extent than exports. It shows beyond peradventure of a doubt that the chief cause of the increased imports was economic recovery in the United States, an occasion not for alarm but for rejoicing on the part of all of us. It shows that the bulk of the increase in imports is accounted for by raw materials or other products for which a rapidly rising purchasing power in this country is increasing the demand, and it points out, further, that most of the increase is accounted for by products competitive only indirectly, if at all, with articles of domestic production. Finally, but not least, it disposes of the notion that the reduced export balance—whatever its cause may have been—is a proper occasion for alarm. On this phase I can do no better than quote the report itself. On page 7 I find the following:

> As already stated, the committee is definitely of the opinion that the decline in our export "balance" in 1936 gives no cause for alarm. Our export balance may fluctuate widely from year to year (e. g., $225,000,000 in 1933; $478,000,000 in 1934; $235,000,000 in 1935) in response to shifting economic conditions at home and abroad.
> There is no reason to assume that a so-called favorable balance of trade is a good thing for every country and under all conditions. It may or it may not be. Commodity trade is only a part of the total of economic transactions with other countries; other items which enter into the balance sheet (i. e., the balance of international payments or accounts), such as tourist trade, immigrant remittances, shipping earnings, insurance, etc., must also be considered.
> The creditor position of the United States today definitely calls for a larger importation of goods and services (excluding interest and dividends) than of exports of goods and services, except as earnings on investments may be reinvested abroad (which only postpones payment of interest and dividends), or as adjustment may be made through continued piling up of stocks of gold in the United States. This does not mean that we should have an "unfavorable" balance of commodity trade alone; but, under present conditions, it does definitely imply a smaller commodity export balance than in the past unless we want to resume foreign lending on a vast scale.
> What the committee desires to stress as of paramount importance is the fact that trade in both directions has expanded greatly in 1936; in fact, by more than a half billion dollars. Our net creditor position and our desire to maintain and expand our export trade render desirable and necessary a growing volume of imports, provided only that they do not disrupt and dislocate domestic industries, but, rather, contribute to a rising prosperity in which all branches of our economic life may share. The caution with which the trade-agreements program has been administered in this latter regard, the higher levels of prices and prosperity in the very industries in which duties have been reduced, as well as in others, and the nature of the increased imports as indicated by the foregoing analysis all attest to the fact that the adjustments that have been taking place are fundamentally in the economic interest of the country as a whole.

The second tune—the statistical medley designed to leave the listener in a sort of musical funk concerning the constructive accomplishments of the program—has no more foundation than the first. From the very outset of the program, powerful organizations hostile to its purposes have been at work, with the best statisticians they could hire, combing every trade figure and seizing at every straw in an effort to play down its effectiveness as an aid to exports but to play up its influence on imports.

The devices resorted to by these improvisers of statistical medley are various and wonderful. They discover that our exports increased to certain of the non-trade-agreement countries more than they did to certain of the trade-agreement countries. They discover that exports of certain products on which we obtained concessions in certain countries increased less to those countries than to certain other countries with which no agreements have been made. Or they unearth the fact that our exports to certain trade-agreement countries have increased little, or perhaps not at all. These and similar bits of statistical fancy work are supposed to leave the unsuspecting layman supine and in grave doubt as to whether anything significant is being accomplished for our export industries.

The chief trouble with these statistical performances is that they are unsupported by practical application. They appear to be arguing, by inference, that when we reduce trade barriers we do not encourage—nay, perhaps even discourage—trade. That is strange doctrine to emanate from representatives of protected industries which are ever seeking to increase, not reduce, trade bariers. Did anyone ever hear of a protectionist asking for reduced duties in order to restrict imports of competitive products? Surely it must be clear to anyone with an ounce of common sense that if the imposition of tariffs and other trade barriers tends to restrict imports and thus reduce trade, the relaxation of such barriers must have the opposite result.

That is the basic error of these ex-parte statisticians who seek to obfuscate the public about this program. What makes it possible for them to operate on this line with an appearance of plausibility is the fact that trade agreements are but one of many factors influencing the course of our foreign trade. Other, and powerful, factors have been at work, such as general economic recovery both at home and abroad; droughts, floods, and so forth. There is no way in which the influence of trade agreements on imports and exports can be isolated from other influences and subjected to precise measurement, the one as against the other. And even if it were posible, it would still be necessary to bear in mind that most of the trade agreements have been in effect but a short time; that it takes time for trade to adjust itself completely to such influences; and that the longer-run effects of most of the agreements are still to be realized.

Such considerations, however, do not prevent the statistical obfuscators from playing with the figures; in fact, just the contrary. One favorite device is to compare percentage increases in exports to with imports from a particular trade agreement country. If it happens that the percentage increase in imports is greater than the percentage increase in exports, the victim who reads this is supposed to jump to the conclusion that this is an alarming state of affairs, brought about by the trade agreement Yet, for any given period, other factors may largely dominate the trade. Our imports may increase sharply, due to domestic recovery, to domestic crop shortages, or to special factors relating to our trade with that particular country. Our exports may be retarded by crop shortage, by adverse economic and political factors in the particular country, or by other factors. They may increase relatively more to some countries with which trade agreements have not been made, but in which economic recovery has been marked, than to some with which agreements have been made. The total imports into a particular trade-agreement country may be increasing but little, or even declining; yet the trade agreement may be enabling the United States to do more business, and obtain a larger share of the trade, than would otherwise have been possible.

As a matter of fact, there are inherent reasons why we should expect the trade agreements with some countries to tend to stimulate imports more than exports, and with others the reverse. If the agreement is with a country in which the barriers to imports from the United States were moderate before the agreement was made, it could hardly be expected that the concessions granted to us would affect its imports in the same manner as would be the case if it were reducing barriers formerly highly restrictive of trade. That is precisely the situation with regard to some of the countries with which we have made agreements. A very substantial part of the value of our agreements with such countries is, and must be, the safeguards which are set up in the way of continuation of the relatively favorable treatment which we have received in the past. With some other countries on whose products we have regularly imposed few or no duties the situation is just the reverse.

The idea that the value of a particular trade agreement is to be measured by a comparison of imports from with exports to that country following the agreement is a superficial and a mercantilistic notion. The purpose of the agreements is to stimulate trade in both directions. Temporarily, external factors may tend either to obscure, or to exaggerate, the apparent effects of the concessions obtained or granted. Yet the clear fact remains that the reduction or removal of barriers to trade, on both sides, must inevitably tend to make it easier for trade to flow both ways than it was before. This is a truism and not a theory. If it were otherwise, then one would have to deny that tariffs and other barriers tend to restrict imports. That, as I have already suggested, is hardly a tenable position for those who seek such barriers as a protection for domestic industries.

I referred a moment ago to the fact that there is no evidence that the trade agreements entered into have tended to increase imports more than exports. It was contended before the Finance Committee that a much larger proportion of the increase in imports may be attributed to the trade-agreements program than of the increase in exports. Those so contending neglected to point out, however, that our exports in 1936 to countries with which our trade agreements were in force during all or part of 1936 were 15 percent greater than in 1935, whereas our exports to all other countries increased by only 4.2 percent. If these figures do not absolutely prove that the concessions we obtained were helpful to our exports, they certainly place a heavy burden of proof on anyone who would deny it. The same objectors neglected to note that, whereas the increase of exports to these trade-agreement countries was nearly four times greater than the increase to other countries, in the case of imports the increase from these same trade-agreement countries was only about one-third greater than the increase from the other countries. If these ratios prove anything, they suggest a greater relative influence of trade agreements on exports than on imports.

As a matter of fact, the specific evidence of export gains to trade-agreement countries offered for the record in the testimony of Assistant Secretary of State Sayre establishes the strongest possible presumption that reduction of uneconomic barriers has been a substantial and important contributing factor. I especially call the Senate's attention to the section of his statement before the Ways and Means Committee which offers a wide range of specific illustrations of sharp increases in exports of both industrial and agricultural products to trade-agreement countries. I also call the Senate's attention to the fact that, generally speaking, exports to trade-agreement countries of products on which we obtained concessions have increased by distinctly greater percentages than have other exports to such countries.

There remains the third string of my musical metaphor—the string which peals forth that familiar strain to the effect that agriculture has gained nothing by this program and stands to gain nothing by it.

In connection with this matter I desire to quote from Mr. Sayre's statement before the committee:

> At this point I should like to make an observation or two, if I may, with regard to agriculture's interest in the trade-agreements program. I have already commented on the concessions obtained for our agricultural products in the agreements thus far negotiated. I cannot, however, ignore the efforts that have been made in certain quarters to misrepresent the objectives and achievements of the program as they affect agriculture and the fundamental interests of agriculture in relation to the program.
> It is one of the ironies of our public life that such misrepresentation and misunderstanding should prevail, in view of the fact that those who have been charged with the responsibility for executing the program have been so painstaking and tireless in their efforts to help agriculture and have accomplished so much in the face of the great obstacles which they have confronted. The fact is that no stone has been left unturned to get valuable concessions for our farm products abroad, and much has already been accomplished. Moreover, there are excellent prospects that much more can be accomplished toward reopening foreign outlets during the next few years.
> There are those who make much of the fact that imports of agricultural products have increased markedly during the past 2 or 3 years and seek to portray this as a highly sinister development for which trade-agreement concessions on farm products are primarily responsible. Nevertheless the essential facts are: (1) That much of the increase in imports of farm products is in raw materials and foodstuffs which are wholly noncompetitive with domestic agriculture and is simply an accompaniment of economic recovery; (2) that most of the remaining increase is in products of which severe domestic shortages developed as the result chiefly of two of the worst droughts in our history; and (3) that trade-agreement concessions on farm products, while facilitating somewhat the entry of certain products, have on the whole been a very minor factor in the import situation.
> In all of the controversial discussion of this matter of farm imports there is one cardinal fact that those who criticize the trade agreements persistently ignore. That fact is that a tariff policy which spoils agriculture's domestic, as well as its foreign market, cannot in the long run be helpful to any branch of agriculture. The prohibitive Hawley-Smoot rates did not rescue agriculture from the depression; just the contrary—they helped to intensify the depression and made the situation infinitely worse for farmers. What comfort is there for farmers in the thought that they are in possession of 100 percent of a domestic market if meanwhile gross farm income falls from $11,900,000,000 to $5,300,000,000, as it did between 1929 and 1932? Which is better for the agricultural producers of this country, complete possession of a domestic market in which they can sell only 100,000,000 pounds of a given commodity at poor prices or 97 percent of a domestic market in which they can sell 200,000,000 pounds at good prices? That is the nub of the whole matter. The trade-agreement program is helping to restore prosperity for the country as a whole, and in doing that it cannot fail to benefit all branches of agriculture.

Doubtless there are some who sincerely feel that agriculture has gained little from the program and stands to gain little. We have had this issue debated backward and forward for nearly 2 years. The voters in the farm States were exposed last autumn to almost every imaginable type of misrepresentation on the subject. The election results speak for themselves. They indicate, to say the very least, that the great majority of voters in the farm States were not sufficiently impressed by the political ballyhoo and babassu against trade agreements to vote against the administration which was responsible for them, and rightly so.

No administration in the history of this country has done so much for the farmers of this country as this one. None has had their interests so much at heart. Trade agreements have been one phase of the general attack on the agricultural problem. From the very beginning of the program Secretary Wallace has stood squarely behind it. In his speeches and writings he has had the courage to tell the truth about it to the farmers despite the frantic efforts of some of the farm lobbyists to discredit it. He has not pretended that trade agreements are the sole solution of the farm problem. But he has insisted that agriculture's dependence on foreign markets make the efforts of the administration to reopen those markets a logical and integral part of any well-ordered program to promote the true interests of agriculture. In a letter to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, and through personal appearance before the Senate Finance Committee, he has given his unqualified endorsement to the pending resolution to renew the act.

I come back, therefore, to my original proposition, namely, that, all things considered, those who have had the responsibility of administering the Trade Agreements Act have done a first-class job. They have not been able to achieve the impossible, but they have battled patiently and tirelessly against an adverse tide and have made remarkable headway. Their record is one of which this administration can justly be proud. They have carried out the mandate of Congress with admirable restraint and caution and with complete fidelity to the letter, as well as to the spirit, of the law.

But the job has not been finished. Our foreign trade still lags behind the other indices of economic recovery, in spite of the marked gains that have been made. Whereas factory employment in October 1936 was 15 percent below the average level of 1929 and industrial production 8 percent below, our exports in October were 50 percent below; and for the year 1936, 53 percent below. That is far better than 1932, when they were 69 percent below; but it is far from satisfactory. This lag in foreign trade is one of the chief obstacles to complete and stable economic recovery. Unless we continue our efforts to remove the excessive barriers that stand in the way of continued expansion of our foreign trade, we will be in danger, not only of retarding full and sustained general recovery but of losing a part of the substantial gains already made.

Let no one suppose for a single moment that either agriculture or industry has not a big stake in the continuance of this program. There need be no illusions about that. Agriculture is still heavily dependent on export outlets. The readjustments that have taken place since 1929 have not altered that basic fact. Even in 1935–36 our agricultural exports were equivalent to the production of some 28,000,000 acres of good farm land. Shut out every dollar's worth of agricultural imports even indirectly competitive with domestic farm products, and we would still have a vast acreage dependent upon exports. During the past 3 years our surpluses of some of the major crops were drastically reduced or eliminated by two of the severest droughts in our entire history. What will happen if we have 1 or 2 years of good or better-than-average yields? The difference between good and poor foreign markets will mean the difference between good and ruinous prices for such crops. When prices of export crops are low, that means increasing diversion of the land to other crops and increasing competition with them.

Industry's stake in the program is likewise a big one. Those powerful branches of our manufacturing industry that are geared to produce for export as well as for the home market—and they are a mighty important part of the entire manufacturing industry of this country—cannot be prosperous if they cannot find profitable foreign outlets for their surpluses.

In spite of the encouraging progress that has been made, trade barriers remain excessively high. It is vital that the efforts of our Government to reduce them should continue. There are now indications of a turn in the tide, at long last, in the direction of more liberal commercial policies throughout the world. The outlook is more promising than at any time during the past few years. There are excellent prospects of negotiations with countries some of which are highly important markets for farm products. Moreover, the continuance of the program has a definite bearing on the issue of peace and war which today hangs so delicately in the balance. None has seen this more clearly, or been more tireless in his efforts to bring the entire country to a realization of it than our great Secretary of State. Every Senator and every citizen would do well to read and ponder the complete text of his letter to me as chairman of the Finance Committee. I shall quote here only the last three paragraphs:

> There is not the slightest doubt that our abandonment of the trade agreements program at this juncture would mean a resumption of international economic warfare which is now showing such marked signs of abatement. Renewed economic warfare would inevitably mean an intensification of the present-day political tension which is already pushing many nations in the direction of military conflict.
> If such a conflict should break out, we shall, of course, do everything humanly possible to make certain that we shall not be involved in war. But even if we escape the doom of actual hostilities, we cannot avoid being hurt by the profound economic upheaval which must inevitably accompany a widespread military conflict anywhere in the world. There is, of course, only one sure way for us to be spared the damage wrought by war and that is for war not to occur.
> There is no more dangerous cause of war than economic distress, and no more potent factor in creating such distress than stagnation and paralysis in the field of international commerce. In the years which lie immediately ahead, an adequate revival of international trade will be the most powerful single force for easing political tensions and averting the danger of war. The most basic interests of our Nation will be betrayed unless we are able to continue for some time ahead to pursue the same policy for bringing about such a trade revival as we have so far pursued under the Trade Agreements Act. Neither constructive thought nor actual experience has suggested any alternative method of attaining this vital objective.

In view of all the circumstances, it is my sincere judgment that a failure on the part of the Senate to approve the pending resolution, without amendment, would be most regrettable. I earnestly believe that its passage is, from every standpoint, in the interest of the Nation as a whole, and I, therefore, urge my colleagues on both sides of this Chamber to give it their wholehearted support.

Mr. President, before I conclude I wish to pay my tribute to the fine service rendered by the distinguished Secretary of State who has carried forward this program. I do not know any gentleman in the present Cabinet or in any President's Cabinet in recent times who has performed a greater service to the country than has the present Secretary of State. He has made a great name for himself. The manner in which this program has been handled under his great leadership is in keeping with the fine services he has otherwise rendered.

Let me venture the suggestion that it will be a long time until there is a general revision of the tariff in the Congress of the United States. Those of us who have been here and observed the consideration of tariff bills in the Congress know how difficult it is to get a fair, a just, an equitable tariff bill passed. As the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] suggests sotto voce—and he has been here a long time—"it is impossible." We know how groups are formed and combinations are created to thwart the purposes and intentions of those who have such bills in charge. It is almost impossible to get a satisfactory measure passed. The negotiating of trade agreements as now conducted by our present Secretary of State is the best way to build up our international trade. While we are doing it in this way we are reducing tariff barriers and other restrictions, thereby promoting trade from and to our country, as well as influencing a better and more common understanding among the peoples of the world.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. McNARY. I assume rightfully that the Senator is speaking for the administration when he says that in the next 4 years there will be no revision of the tariff?

Mr. HARRISON. No; the Senator surely heard me say I was only expressing my own personal belief that it will be some time before there is a general revision of the tariff.

Mr. McNARY. I am curious about the situation, and I think that curiosity is shared by most of us. There are certain imperfections and inequities in the present existing situation. Are we to suffer those to continue rather than submit them to the deliberation and consideration of the Congress?

Mr. HARRISON. Nothing would delight me more than to engage in a general revision of the tariff. I know that my views in the matter would be disregarded and my hopes shattered before I got fairly started, and that in the end I would not get anywhere. The Senator from Oregon is a distinguished Member of this body who has been here a long time. He has voted right a great many times. However, in his long experience here, even while he was trying to prevent it, he has seen combinations formed to put into effect certain high tariffs. I think one of the worst things ever enacted in the law or that was ever considered by the Senate was a combination which was formed here on certain articles—and this within our memory. I need not mention the incident with more particularity. Everyone remembers it.

I assert again that the better plan is the one now being pursued in the matter of negotiating trade agreements. This is better, in my opinion, for the time. Until the country gets completely back on its feet and until world economic conditions are stabilized it is much better for us to try to negotiate these international agreements, giving and taking, not to the injury of the American producer, because it has not been shown in a single instance that we have conceded to the point where it has hurt an industry as much as it has benefited it under these agreements. The men who are conducting these negotiations are well grounded in the work. They have their feet on the ground. They may not please everyone, but they are doing a good piece of work. The work is not yet finished, and we ought to extend the authority which was given 3 years ago so the work may be continued. That is just what the joint resolution provides.

I hope, after the Senate has considered it, we may do what the House has done, but by a proportionately larger vote—pass it without amendment, sending it to the President for his signature—so that negotiations may be continued for the enlargement of our international trade and the general welfare of our great country.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PEPPER in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. BONE. I am sure that we are quite likely to enact neutrality legislation very shortly. However, I wonder if the committee would be willing to have an amendment to the joint resolution now before us extending the life of these trade agreements or the authority of the President to enter into them, an amendment which would direct the Secretary of State to incorporate in all such reciprocal trade agreements which might be entered into hereafter a reservation of the right of the United States to exercise fully and completely all the powers given the Government in the neutrality legislation which we all hope will soon be enacted? I am rather inclined to think it would be a good suggestion to follow. It would not interfere with the trade-agreement legislation.

Mr. HARRISON. As a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I voted for the recommendation of the committee on the neutrality measure. I read somewhere in the papers, though I know not how authentic it may be, that such a provision is being placed in the trade agreements. As I said, I do not know whether the statement was authentic. I should dislike very much to have an amendment of that character placed on this measure. I would rather have it presented otherwise.

Mr. BONE. I had thought of it, not perhaps as rising to the dignity of a Senate resolution but merely as a direction, because the question of trade relations under neutrality legislation is something of a question that is relevant.

Mr. HARRISON. They both tend toward peace, in my opinion, but I would not want this joint resolution complicated with such a proposal. I very much hope the Senator will not offer such an amendment. If it should be offered I should feel disposed to vote against it.

Mr. BONE. I had hoped the committee would tack it on the joint resolution merely as a direction to the Secretary of State. I think it is a very desirable thing to do.

Mr. HARRISON. As chairman of the committee, I would be very glad, with the approval of my colleagues on the committee, to bring it to their attention and transmit the request to the Secretary of State.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. KING. That does not mean the chairman would recommend or bring to the attention of the committee the suggestion made by the Senator from Washington with a view to incorporating it in the pending joint resolution?

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, no.

Mr. KING. His suggestion is to consider it as an independent proposal. I should object to it being attached to the joint resolution now before the Senate.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I did not wish to interrupt the able Senator from Mississippi in his presentation today. I recall that 3 years ago, when the original bill dealing with this subject was before the Senate, I opposed it, and followed in debate the Senator who is now offering this joint resolution. At that time I stated on the floor of the Senate that I was very much afraid no sufficient opportunity would be given to the producers of this country to present their views when there came before the State Department the question of a hearing touching an agreement with some foreign nation.

I have had some experience along that line. I recall 2 years ago appearing before the State Department and the Tariff Commission, attempting to locate the particular products that I thought might be affected by a trade agreement. I was told that the plan was general in its nature. I was not apprised that any particular product of agriculture or manufactures was to be considered. I was obliged to guess at the scope of the proposed agreement. It was very unfair.

The same experience, I think, came to all who appeared before the State Department and the Tariff Commission. The indictment was a blanket one. There was no specific statement as to the product or commodities about to be considered in the negotiations for a reciprocal-trade agreement.

I thought I heard the able Senator from Mississippi say a few moments ago that there was a modification of the former plan, so that now we might have a better understanding than we have had heretofore of the product that was about to be traded off or the duty to be modified.

Mr. HARRISON. Dr. Sayre stated before the committee, and I have heard him say privately, that those in charge of making these trade agreements had progressed with reference to their public hearings; that they thought they had previously given an opportunity to everybody to be heard, but they had issued an order that in future negotiations they would give public notice of the certain particular things and products about which they were to negotiate, and that anyone who desired to come before them with reference to those products could do so, and that nothing would be incorporated in the agreements outside of the particular articles or products enumerated.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, that is comforting, but not wholly complete or satisfactory. Does the record contain this promulgation which has been made by the Secretary of State, and which has just been referred to?

Mr. HARRISON. It was made by Dr. Sayre, the Assistant Secretary of State.

Mr. McNARY. But is it simply a verbal statement which was made before the committee, or is it a policy which has been announced by the Department of State?

Mr. HARRISON. It is a policy which has been announced by the negotiators appointed by the Secretary of State to negotiate these trade agreements.

Mr. McNARY. Can I find it in the record of the Senate hearings?

Mr. HARRISON. If it is in the hearings at all, it is under the heading of Dr. Sayre's statement. I have not refreshed my memory about it.

Mr. McNARY. In view of the Senator's very complete statement, and the splendid assurance he has given, would he be willing to obtain from Dr. Sayre a letter embodying the particular things he is going to do in the future, and have it placed in the RECORD?

Mr. HARRISON. I will either find the statement which was made or I will obtain a letter to that effect, if it is possible, or I will make an explanation regarding it.

Mr. McNARY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. VANDENBERG obtained the floor.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, if I may further intrude, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the able Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], chairman of the Finance Committee, has just completed probably the ablest possible defense that could be made of the trade-agreement program. In fact, in some instances it is far abler than the case he has presented warrants.

I rise in opposition and to present certain phases of the matter upon which the Senator from Mississippi has very adroitly remained silent. There is a challenging case to be made in sound faith, sound economics, and sound constitutionalism against this program.

My reasons against the existing reciprocal trade formula have been stated so often that I do not intend to labor the RECORD with them at great length or in detail. I prefer to emphasize and dramatize some of my objections through the more constructive method of submitting amendments a little later in the debate; but on the general subject I do desire to present a brief summary of the reasons why I continue to rise against the extension of the Reciprocal Trade Treaty Act.

I owe it to candor at the outset, and to an appropriate recognition of my function as a Michigan representative, to state that many of my constituents, regardless of party, are in disagreement with me in this matter. Particularly does the automotive industry, in much of its spokesmanship, endorse these trade agreements. The automotive industry has been most generously and sympathetically treated by the State Department in all the agreements thus far negotiated. I am glad to join in its appreciative acknowledgment of this sympathetic consideration. The press of my State, in its metropolitan sectors, very generally favors the Hull policy.

I have no disposition to disguise these facts; but I believe Michigan agriculture very generally disapproves of the Hull policies, either in whole or in part; and for myself, viewing the national problem that is involved, I cannot surrender the deep conviction that, regardless of incidental and spotted commercial benefits here and there, this particular kind of reciprocity is unfortunate, ill-advised, unwarranted, and in direct violation of the Constitution of the United States. I stand for reciprocity in noncompetitive goods or with the American cost of production protected in respect of competitive goods. I stand for reciprocity which produces an equivalent net American advantage. I stand for reciprocity which does not leave American producers wholly at the final mercy of secret bureaucratic negotiations, and which falls within what I believe to be the American constitutional system. But I do not believe the present and pending formula remotely meets these specifications. Therefore, I am opposed to it, for the following specific reasons, briefly summarized:

First, the law itself, and therefore this proposed extension of it, is an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power to the Executive. I shall not enlarge upon this point; I shall leave it to the far abler argument of those who subsequently will follow me, and who have a right to speak from a technical point of view; but I do give my layman's conception of it that it is an unconstitutional delegation of power beyond any peradventure whatsoever.

While it limits tariff changes to 50 percent, it does not assert a definite formula, such as the cost-of-production formula in the elastic or flexible provision in the tariff law, to guide the Executive. The absence of a definite formula is the fatal defect, a statement which is made not on my own responsibility but on the responsibility of many of the most distinguished constitutional lawyers in the land.

Many of the great lawyers in the Congress opposed even the elastic tariff, despite its definite cost-of-production rule, as an unconstitutional delegation of power. The distinguished Secretary of State himself, for whom I have the same high regard and warm affection which was expressed by the able senior Senator from Mississippi—the Secretary of State himself, then a Member of the House of Representatives, said in the debates respecting the elastic tariff law:

> I strongly condemn the proposed course which contemplates such additional authority to the President as would practically vest in him the supreme taxing power of the Nation—

These are Mr. Hull's words, not mine—

> Contrary to the plainest and most fundamental provisions of the Constitution.

Mr. President, I did not personally believe that the elastic tariff, with its definite cost-of-production rule, warranted this challenge; but when the cost-of-production rule disappeared in the Trade Agreements Act, and for it was substituted a vague reliance on pious but nonetheless indefinite executive discretion, it seemed to me that the same challenge then became and now becomes inescapable. The utterly inscrutable thing to me today is how the distinguished Secretary of State, and those who shared his views, who found a limited yardstick delegation of elastic tariff powers to be "contrary to the plainest and most fundamental provisions of the Constitution", can find no such infirmity at all in a delegation of power without any definitive formula, which is being used not only to rewrite tariffs, but also to tie congressional hands respecting internal Federal taxation, and even to abrogate treaties of the Government of the United States.

The distinguished Secretary of State, then a Representative in Congress, declared that the former utterly limited elastic tariff power was—

> A vast and uncontrolled power, larger than had been surrendered by one great, coordinate department of government to another since the British Commons wrenched the taxing power from an autocratic king.

That is the way the present Secretary of State felt—and I repeat, I speak of him with the greatest admiration and respect—when the limited elastic flexible tariff powers were proposed. Yet now, when an infinitely greater delegation of power is being used under his auspices and upon his authority, all suggestion of unconstitutionality has disappeared.

I confess that I cannot follow such logic.

I am not speaking now merely of the letter of the Constitution; I am speaking of the spirit of the Constitution. I am not speaking of the matter as a challenge in consistency. Consistency is interesting and laudable; but the distinguished Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] has recently reminded us that it also is the vice of little minds. His position, as I understand it, is that while consistency may be a jewel, too much jewelry may be vulgar. [Laughter.] I am not discussing consistency; I am discussing the logic of the proposition. I am saying that if the flexible tariff was deemed an unconstitutional delegation of power to the Executive when the delegation included a fixed cost of production formula to make the Executive's decisions purely ministerial, I do not see how the reciprocal tariff can be accepted as a constitutional delegation of power to the Executive, when the delegation of it lacks any fixed rule whatever, but palpably depends purely upon Executive discretion.

Mr. President, I supported the flexible tariff. I was perfectly willing to trust the President then, and am now, within the boundaries of the cost-of-production rule. The Supreme Court has since held the flexible-tariff provision to be constitutional; but it did so with great emphasis upon the limitations created by the cost-of-production rule. It virtually said that the absence of the rule which had been fixed would have been fatal. The rule is wholly absent in the pending measure. In other words, it seems to my lay mind that those who thought the flexible tariff, with its infinitely lesser delegation of power, was unconstitutional, and those who supported the flexible tariff as being constitutional only because it contained the cost-of-production rule, must find their own logic inexorably challenging the constitutionality of the present act.

But there is something more involved today than there was when the reciprocal act was passed 3 years ago. We now have the proofs of the vast extent of delegated power which the State Department thinks it got under this act; and I am unable to believe that some of these exhibits can win any Senatorial approval. I am unable to believe that the Senate will be willing to extend some of these amazing usurpations of power by the State Department; and I think it can be clearly demonstrated they are such, and I challenge any proof to the contrary.

Now I desire to submit two exhibits upon this score. I wish to submit two examples of what I believe to be the utterly unjustified use by the State Department of the power which it thought it found in the Trade Agreements Act which we are now asked to renew and extend. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the Trade Agreements Act between the United States of America and Brazil, which became effective January 1, 1936. I desire to show that it contains a section which absolutely ties the hands of Congress against assessing any new national or Federal internal taxes—I repeat, internal taxes—against the imports from Brazil. I assert, and I shall undertake to demonstrate textually, that this is a direct invasion of the domestic taxing power. Where is the warrant in the law for such an exercise of Executive discretion, and where is the warrant in the Constitution itself, even if it were in the law?

Now, let us see. I read from article 7 of the Brazilian trade agreement:

> Articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States of America or the United States of Brazil enumerated and described in schedules I and II, respectively, after importation into the other country—> shall be exempt from any national or Federal internal taxes, fees, charges, or exactions other or higher than those imposed or required to be imposed by laws of the United States of Brazil and the United States of America, respectively, in effect on the day of the signature of this agreement, subject to constitutional requirements.

Listen to this—

In other words, within this act which we are asked to extend without limit, the Department of State has assumed to find authority to tie the hands of Congress, to tie the hands of every State in the Union, against any increase in—

Internal taxes, fees, charges, or exactions.

Mr. President, there is no doubt about the power and authority which the Department of State thinks it has in this respect. This is no mere accident. I call the Senate's attention to my colloquy with Assistant Secretary Sayre, found at page 39 of part I of the hearings. Surely there is some concern left for the integrity and the validity of the congressional constitutional authority. Surely it has not as yet all gone. I read from the hearings before the Senate Finance Committee on February 10, 1937:

Senator VANDENBERG. Would you say you had the power to agree with England that the internal tax on British cigarettes sold in this country could not be raised?

Mr. SAYRE. I would want to consult a good many lawyers before I answered a question like that, sir.

Senator VANDENBERG. I think on the basis of the Brazilian precedent your answer would be "yes."

Mr. SAYRE. I would want to consult a good many lawyers.

In other words, Mr. President, we are on notice that the negotiating authority of the Department of State at this hour is not willing to say that there is not contained in this simple, innocent little act of extension upon which we are now asked to vote the hidden authority which will permit the negotiators of a trade agreement to reach within the internal taxing power of the United States and every State in the Union, and bind the hands of National and State legislators against the exercise of free authority in the internal taxing aspect.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. As I heard the Senator read the provision in the Brazilian agreement, I did not understand that it said anything about State taxes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. About what?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Did it not specifically limit itself to Federal taxes?

Mr. VANDENBERG. It says—

From any National or Federal internal taxes, fees, charges, or exactions.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. That does not mean State taxes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. No; but I am asserting to the Senate that if the State Department thinks it has the power to barter away the internal taxing authority in respect to Federal taxes, it is only a logical step to the State Department's invasion of the internal taxing power of the individual States in connection with some future trade agreement. Does the Senator understand what I am trying to say?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. With the provision contained in the measure that it refers only to National and Federal taxes, I cannot understand that it can be logically argued that the State Department has the power to limit or would attempt to limit the power of States.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let me ask the Senator a question. Admitting a difference of opinion regarding the collateral effect of this provision upon the State taxing power—and I am simply arguing that collaterally the State one day may not be a free agent—the Senator would freely concede that, as this trade agreement reads, it does reach into the internal taxing power of the Congress of the United States, would he not?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Yes. My objection is to the Senator's use of and repetition of the words "the States."

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let us leave that out, if we can agree on the other. Will not the Senator also agree with me that it is utterly impossible for us to delegate to the Secretary of State the power to tie our hands in respect to internal taxes?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. If that be true, then all the argument about what the State Department has done is rather immaterial; because, if they cannot do it, what they have done does not amount to anything.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Ah, Mr. President, that is a very interesting statement; but does it not put us on notice that when we extend their power for 3 years we should do the thing which I shall specifically ask to have done, namely, amend the grant of the extension of power with a limitation that there shall be no further effort, even, to tie the hands of the internal taxing officers of the United States? While it is very easy for us to say "they cannot do it", yet it involves a moral responsibility after they have done it; and I submit to the Senator that now is the time for Congress to assert to the State Department that there never was any delegation of power to control the internal tax prerogative, and that we do not propose that there shall be.

Does the Senator quarrel with that?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I do not quarrel with the conclusion the Senator reaches; but I think we should be very careful in attempting to limit this power, and we should weigh the benefits that may be obtained as a result of the use of the power as against the difficulties which, as the Senator says, may arise by reason of doing something they cannot lawfully do. I cannot see that it is very important to take up very much time arguing about it, because the Senator from Michigan is the one who says it cannot be done.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator says the Department cannot do anything they cannot do. That is something like the old familiar story of the man who was in jail, who was told by his lawyer that the authorities could not put him in jail; but there he was. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. With respect to the provision which the Senator says is a limitation upon, if not a grant of exemption from, taxes upon products sent in by Brazil, I ask the able Senator from Michigan if he has information or has discovered whether that is not a mere reciprocity by way of a similar grant of immunity given to United States products going into Brazil as to taxes there, such as is granted here with respect to Brazilian products?

Mr. VANDENBERG. It so states in the article I read; but I submit to my able friend, the Senator from Illinois, that that is beside the point as to whether or not we have the right to delegate that sort of a taxing power to the Secretary of State, or whether he has the right to use it.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator from Michigan takes the position, does he, that under the treaty we cannot release certain products imported from a foreign country from a form of tax here, in return for the foreign country's releasing our products from the same amount of tax there?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I take the position that under the terms of the act, the constitutionality of which I completely doubt, it is assumed that import duties reciprocally may be frozen, or raised, or lowered; but after the goods have entered this country, I submit to the Senator from Illinois, I am complaining against a holding by the State Department that Congress may not deal with them on an excise internal tax basis. They have ceased to be imports. They have flowed into the stream of domestic commerce. They are part of the business of the United States; and when they are a part of the business of the United States, I submit to the Senator that they are within the taxing jurisdiction of the Congress of the United States, in spite of any effort the Department of State may have made to immunize them.

Mr. LEWIS. Does not the able Senator think that provision was limited to mean that there should be no tax upon the product as it is entered here under our tariff tax levied upon imports upon the theory that by putting on such extra tax a burden is placed upon the product by which it must be increased in price and its capacity for sale diminished? Does not the Senator feel that that is all the limitation of tax; that it does not have any reference whatever to any tax by the United States after the product becomes the property of the citizen of the United States?

Mr. VANDENBERG. No, Mr. President. The Assistant Secretary of State very frankly discussed the matter with the committee, and said that it means precisely what I am saying. I desire to be very fair with him. His defense and explanation of it is solely that we cannot hope to have an effective reciprocal-trade arrangement which deals with import duties alone if, after we have frozen or reduced our import duties, the contracting parties may go back home and nullify the effect of the whole transaction with an internal excise tax as a substitute. The Department is perfectly frank about the matter. It intends by this agreement to prevent Congress from touching with internal taxation any of the commodities listed in the trade agreement upon which this immunity has been granted.

Let me show the Senate how it works. The Senator from Mississippi had a great deal of fun talking about babassu-nut oil. I know just as little about babassu-nut oil as he does, which means that with respect to it I am in a complete state of ignorance; but I do know what the witnesses said upon the subject. Here is the contemplation which I submit to my able friend from Illinois as an explanation of the realities involved: Congress in its wisdom put an internal excise tax upon imported coconut oil for the defense and protection of domestic agriculture. We will not argue whether they were right or wrong; it was the congressional judgment that that tax should be imposed. After the Congress had taken that action, then out of Brazil came this new and heretofore unknown competitive oil made from the babassu nut, which is now coming in by millions of tons per month, and is doing precisely the same thing in respect to the domestic vegetable oils and fats as was done by the import of coconut oil. Therefore it is threatening to undo whatever the congressional objective was when it put the excise tax on coconut oil.

Now, I submit to the Senator that Mr. Sayre and Mr. Hull and the State Department have made it impossible, except through a breach of faith, for Congress to say that the babassu-nut oil from Brazil shall be taxed precisely the same as coconut oil from the Philippine Islands. That is the vice of the situation.

Suppose we concluded, as we previously concluded in respect to coconut oil, that it was essential for the sake of domestic agriculture that there should be a similar excise tax against the import of this Brazilian nut; our hands are tied as a result of this agreement; and I submit to the Senator from Illinois and his customary candor that that is the use of a power that we never proposed to give to the State Department and which they have no right to exercise under the Constitution.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, does the Senator contend, after that oil has reached our country, America, and has passed, we will say, into the hands of the manufacturer who makes soap from it, that the soap thus made from the oil or the oil in the hands of the manufacturer previously to being converted into soap cannot be taxed by the States where the manufacturers live or by the Federal Government under our taxing laws?

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator will have to answer his own question so far as following the commodity down into the processing net result is concerned. I go only to the point—because I have not thought it through beyond that—that the raw material, the oil itself, enters this country, and I say that the State Department has tied the hands of Congress in respect to the exercise of the kind of power that we thought it was necessary and advisable to exercise in respect to coconut oil.

I am not arguing whether it should have been done; I am simply saying that Congress concluded it had to be done; and I am saying that the State Department has bartered away our right to say again under similar circumstances that it would have to be done if such were the conclusion.

Mr. President, that is not the worst of it. I submit there was a delegation of power which no Senator in this Chamber contemplated would ever be used; but there is another power which, certainly, no Senator who has the slighest respect for the fundamental responsibilities and prerogatives of the United States Senate as a body can condone. I now call attention to the reciprocal agreement with Colombia which became effective May 20, 1936, and I read from page 14 of the printed text, article XI, of the agreement. Listen to this:

As long as the present agreement remains in force, it shall supersede any provisions of the treaty of peace, amity, navigation, and commerce between the United States of America and the Republic of New Granada, signed at Bogotá, December 12, 1846, which may be inconsistent with this agreement. However, upon the expiration of this agreement, the provisions of the aforesaid treaty which have been suspended temporarily shall automatically resume operation and shall continue in full force and effect subject to termination as provided in that treaty.

The State Department issued a long, detailed official explanation of the Colombian treaty on September 13, 1935, in which it gave us much detail along with other matters, but it dismissed article XI with this curt, cryptic, and wholly unrevealing sentence:

Article XI covers the relations of the agreement to certain existing—treaties between the United States and Colombia.

In other words, the State Department finds itself in this strange paradoxical position: They say, "Oh, no; these agreements are not treaties; there is no necessity for Senate ratification of these agreements because they are merely agreements and they do not fall within the treaty power"; yet, according to their own official explanation of the paragraph I have read in the Colombian agreement, they have chosen in using the power given them to make what they call agreements to abrogate existing treaties and further to assume the power and authority to recall those treaties back to life at the end of this trade agreement, when, of course, the treaty is dead after it has been abrogated in respect to any provision of it.

Mr. President, where was there anything in the Trade Agreement Act which gave the State Department any power to reach back into the independent structure of international treaty law and assume the authority to say that any of our external agreements shall be abrogated, or, after being abrogated, shall be renewed? Where is the authority in the original act for any such use of power; and even if there were such authority could it possibly fall within the boundaries of the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to my able friend from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I beg to advise the able Senator that it was myself who, closing the debate on the measure to which he alludes, took the position that the trade agreements which the President was given power to negotiate were not treaties within the meaning of the word as used in the Constitution, but were mere trade compacts as to which we were constituting the President as a mere agent of trade, as we had constituted hundreds of others over all Europe and Asia in the matter of trade agreements in our behalf.

I ask the Senator is he quite sure in his conviction as to these utterances which he says are equivalent to admissions that the treaty with Colombia was modified? Do they refer to the treaty or do they merely refer to such provisions of that treaty as relates to the mere subject matter to which we subsequently have made addenda or changed by the last reciprocity arrangement?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think the Senator has described the precise thing that has happened. I repeat the exact language.

As long as the present agreement remains in force—

That is, the trade agreement—

it shall supersede any provisions of the treaty of peace, amity, navigation, and commerce between the United States of America and the Republic of New Granada, signed December 12, 1846, which may be inconsistent wtih this agreement.

That certainly is an amendment of the old treaty of 1846; that certainly cannot be considered as doing anything except reaching back into the treaty of 1846, a treaty which was ratified by the Senate of the United States and which no one else has any right to tamper with conclusively. It certainly does reach back and invade the senatorial authority.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to my friend from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. I do not wish to have it inferred from what I have said that I am withdrawing anything I have heretofore said or have altered my position, which is that if these trade arrangements are treaties within the meaning of the term "treaty" under the Constitution, I deny the power of the Senate to agree to abdicate its duty that calls for it to ratify a compact before it becomes a treaty. I respectfully insist that if we entered into an agreement by which we would abdicate our duty under the Constitution to ratify treaties we, ourselves, would violate the Constitution.

Second. I insisted heretofore, as I insist now, that if a trade agreement is a treaty within that sense, this honorable body has no right to abdicate the duty imposed upon it by the Constitution. Therefore, I take the liberty to ask the able Senator would he not realize the distinction, if it be well taken, which I contend, that, so far as the mere matter of exchange of goods for goods is concerned, in that respect a trade agreement is a mere qualification of trade; and if that be so, it cannot be said to be a treaty within the meaning of that word as expressed in the Constitution and as used in that document. The mere fact that we call it a trade treaty does not make it a treaty within the Constitution. It merely constitutes it a compact of trade and exchange between countries negotiated through our trade agent, whom we speak of as the President of the United States. If that point be not well taken, then we are not acting constitutionally in allowing these compacts to go without ratification of this body, as I behold it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I thank the able Senator for his statement. A portion of his statement is not involved in the particular point I am now stressing. I submit that, whatever the State Department choose to call these agreements, for the purpose, in my judgment, of evading Senate ratification, whether they call them trade agreements or anything else, when they insert within such an agreement a limitation upon or a suspension of what is an existing treaty, they put themselves absolutely beyond the realm of logic in respect to their own hypothesis.

So, Mr. President, there are at least two exhibits to which I fail to find any answer, two exhibits concerning which I fail to hear any justification, two exhibits to prove the extent to which the State Department is willing to use this delegated power even beyond the extent of the delegation itself. Since it is my position that the original delegation was unconstitutional, it must be my position—and I fail to understand how anyone can take any other position in logic—that these agreements, which thus themselves invade the constitutional jurisdiction of the Senate, cannot possibly be condoned or justified. It seems to me, when we have been put upon notice as to the extent to which the State Department is willing to extend and expand its authority, we had better write a few limitations in the joint resolution of extention before we again lose all control of the acts which may be done under it.

So much for that phase of the matter.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield before he leaves that phase of the matter?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am glad to yield.

Mr. BORAH. It has always been my view that these trade agreements are treaties; that they measure up to every definition of a treaty. They are binding contracts between sovereign nations. But waiving that consideration for the time, after that, I agree entirely with the able Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]; we cannot waive our constitutional duty to ratify treaties.

Here, however, we have a situation which I wish to emphasize for a moment. We have a treaty with Colombia, which is conceded to be a treaty made in the usual course of negotiating and ratifying treaties. We have a trade agreement with Colombia. Certainly nothing less than an agreement equal in force and effect to a treaty could abrogate the first treaty.

If this agreement has any force or effect whatever with reference to the modification of the former treaty we must take the position, it seems to me, that it is a treaty. Otherwise, whatever has been said with reference to modifying the treaty would be wholly void, ineffective, far beyond their jurisdiction to act. Of course, the treaty with Colombia can be modified by a trade agreement if it is desired to bring the trade agreement to the Senate and have it ratified. But the Secretary of State certainly cannot modify a treaty of the United States by an agreement with which the treaty-making power has nothing to do.

Mr. LEWIS. Is it the Senator's position, from his experience, that the ordinary trade treaty negotiated by our trade agents abroad with various countries must be or is required by law to be ratified by the Senate?

Mr. BORAH. In my opinion, when we make an agreement with a foreign nation with reference to trade or anything else, which is an agreement binding upon the two nations, it is a treaty and must be ratified by the Senate. Up until very recent years that was the undisputed and accepted doctrine of this country. We might make an agreement with a nation which is in the nature of an Executive agreement. It might have to do with things over which the Executive has exclusive control. It might have to do with the protection of the rights of particular citizens. But when we reach up to the dignity of binding the Nation as a nation, whether it is trade, or whether it is extradition, or what it is, it is a treaty.

Mr. LEWIS. Would the Senator conclude that bringing silver from China, say, with the consent of the Chinese Government, under laws we have lately enacted under an agreement the details of which he may recall, would require the confirmation of the United States Senate?

Mr. BORAH. I do not recall the details of the agreement to which the Senator refers. I do not know what its binding effect was upon the respective nations or whether it was an agreement running with binding obligations upon the Nation; but I do not modify my view that if it is a contract between sovereign countries, binding upon the nations as sovereigns, then it is a treaty in every sense of the word.

Mr. LEWIS. I apologize to the Senator from Michigan and thank him for his generosity in permitting these interruptions.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am very glad to have the able Senator's observations. I particularly welcome the observations of my distinguished friend from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], who has expressed much more clearly than I did my own definite and unequivocal conviction in respect to this phase of the subject. I desire now to turn to another phase. Let us leave the realm of constitutional discussion. Let us find out what is really happening to America under this much-praised system of reciprocal-trade agreements.

Mr. President, I profoundly doubt the wisdom of a general campaign of tariff reductions at the present time; and I believe this is precisely what is occurring. The use of the most-favored-nation formula for generalizing all trade-agreement benefits to the whole wide world, without specific compensation, beautifully suits itself to such a purpose. I cannot help remembering the sage observation of the late Senator John Sharp Williams, of Mississippi, who preceded the present able Finance Committee chairman in the Senate, and who said—quoting John Sharp Williams:

> There is also a tariff revision by piecemeal, which is the handmaiden of the other system. This is the tariff revision by reciprocal-trade agreements with other nations. Much can be done along this piecemeal line of tariff revision under a Democratic or approximately a Democratic law.

Mr. President, in my judgment, that is precisely the thing that is going on. It is proceeding without congressional cooperation, although the Constitution clearly establishes congressional responsibility. It is proceeding without reference to the difference in cost of production at home and abroad, which is the sole defense upon which American agriculture, industry, and labor can rely.

It is significant in retrospect to read Assistant Secretary of State Sayre's testimony, in March 1934, when the trade agreement law was first proposed. He listed anonymously 705 basic commodities from 29 major countries. He then asserted these were to be the basis for negotiating trade agreements. Every congressional effort to obtain some sort of identification was successfully resisted. Senators will remember how we tried to find out what it was, by way of example or demonstration, that it was proposed to do, what product it was upon which it was proposed to reciprocate these agreements. Never once was a specification permitted to our knowledge. But we now are able to identify Mr. Sayre's list of 705 basic commodities. We find that it covers practically the entire tariff schedule, and practically all of 3,000 rates.

In other words, the executive branch of the Government knew in advance that it proposed to rewrite practically the entire tariff law by Executive order. It is proceeding substantially according to this preconceived purpose; and those American producers not yet touched may reasonably anticipate their early turn upon the chopping block. This, I submit, puts our entire economic destiny, as respects every protected job and every protected commodity, at the absolute mercy of whatever unnamed group of negotiators may be delegated by the State Department to make these trade agreements according to their own notion of the propriety of things and according to their own well-known ideas of internationalism. It is the greatest single delegation of the greatest single power that Congress has ever made.

I repeat that I do not believe this is a safe time for a general tariff revision or a general leveling of protective-tariff rates. If there are excessive and exorbitant rates, they can be effectually reached through the elastic clause in the Tariff Act of 1930. That there are few such rates, in spite of wholesale condemnations to the contrary, is clearly indicated by the record of the present administration's actions under section 336 of the Tariff Act of 1930, the so-called elastic clause.

There has been much complaint about the Smoot-Hawley Act, and I certainly do not propose to resurrect it for the purpose of providing a post-mortem defense; but it is very interesting to me that in spite of what were claimed to be the notoriously indefensible exactions of the Smoot-Hawley Act, and although it has been officially condemned time and time again by our friends across the aisle and by their party as a policy, never once in the 4 years they have had complete control of the entire legislative branch of the Government has there been one step taken toward its repeal; and what has happened? That is what I am now coming to.

Those who condemn the Smoot-Hawley Act have had the chance, under the elastic-tariff law, to go to the Tariff Commission and secure the reduction of any rate of duty which is higher than that necessary to measure the difference in cost of production at home and abroad. What have they done? In 4 years the Tariff Commission has been appealed to in regard to just 35 commodities. Just 35 times in 4 years the Tariff Commission has been asked to investigate whether or not the existing rates are exorbitant and excessive, whether or not they are greater than the actual difference in cost of production at home and abroad; and what has happened as a result of these 35 investigations? Eleven rates out of 35 were actually raised, 11 more were left without change, and just 13 were reduced. The mountain labored and brought forth a mouse! There is the net result—13 rates were reduced in 4 years under the cost-of-production rule!

I submit that it is highly significant of the rising cost level in the United States that the Tariff Commission could not honestly find "exorbitant" rates when they had to tie themselves to the cost-of-production rule. I submit that corresponding emphasis is given by this contemplation to the necessity for continued protection.

Still more significant is the record for the recent calendar year 1936. In all 12 months of the past year just six commodity rates were reviewed by the Tariff Commission and by the President under their joint elastic powers, although the whole wide tariff structure was open to them at any point they wanted to walk in. Just six times in 1936 were these powers invoked under the cost-of-production rule. Once the rate on liquor was lowered; but five times out of six in 1936, when the cost-of-production rule was applied by the President on the advice of the Tariff Commission, the rates had to be increased.

That is what happens when the cost-of-production rule is consulted. That is what happens under the present administration when it is required to protect the American standard of living and the American standard of wage. That is what happens when the administration is required by statute to preserve the differential between the cost of production at home and abroad, and thus to give American industry and agriculture the primary control of their own domestic market. Five times out of six, when the present administration applied the cost-of-production rule in 1936, they had to raise the rates; but when they used their trade-treaty policy, freed from any cost-of-production rule, free to do as they pleased with their internationalism and their kindred negotiations, 100 times out of 100 they decreased the protection for the American agriculturist, the American laborer, and the American industrialist.

That is why I say we are entitled to recall the words of John Sharp Williams, and to recognize the cold-blooded fact that we are getting a general tariff revision today to a lower basis, when first the administration could not get it under the elastic clause which requires them to consult the cost of production, and, second, when they would not dare seek to get it by a frontal attack upon the tariff law upon the floors of Congress.

Mr. President, there is no doubt about the fact that there are many groups in this country who share the view I am asserting here regarding the present necessity for continued legitimate protection on the basis of the difference in cost of production at home and abroad. There is no doubt about the existence of groups believing in that proposition, in spite of the very suave and persuasive way in which my able friend from Mississippi went around the subject.

I will give just one exhibit. I will call attention to the brief filed with the Finance Committee by the American Wage Earners' Protective Conference.

Let us see, Mr. President, who the American Wage Earners' Protective Conference is. This is no ordinary group. This is the kind of group to which my friends across the aisle, particularly, are usually willing to listen; the kind of group to which we all ought to be willing to listen in respect to the American standard of living. Who is in the American Wage Earners' Protective Conference? The International Photo Engravers' Union, the Glass Bottle Blowers' Association, the Boot and Shoe Workers' Union, the Cigar Makers' International Union, the National Brotherhood of Operative Potters, the United Association of Plumbers and Steamfitters of the United States and Canada, the American Flint Glass Workers' Union, the United Wallpaper Crafts, the American Wire Weavers' Protective Association. These poor groups have not had the benefit of the eloquence of the Senator from Mississippi and they are benightedly joining in still protesting that there is an American standard of living and an American wage which cannot be preserved against foreign competition without the use of the rule of cost of production.

I have not finished reading this list. It also includes the American Federation of Musicians, the International Union of Operating Engineers, the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, the International Brotherhood of Bookbinders, the Amalgamated Lithographers' Association, the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees and Moving-Picture Machine Operators, the International Brotherhood of Firemen and Oilers, and the International Fur Workers' Union. What do they say? This is what they say to you, Mr. President, this afternoon, in respect to this specific issue, and they have said it within the past week in writing, so that it could be reported to you:

> In closing, we desire to state most emphatically that we are opposed to our country entering into international trade treaties or trade agreements with foreign nations without ratification of such treaties or agreements by the Senate of the United States. We are more particularly opposed to our entry into trade treaties or trade agreements with foreign nations, which treaties or agreements permit the delivery into the United States—> the delivery into the United States of the products of foreign workers or farmers at total landed costs which are less than the production costs of similar or competitive goods, articles, or commodities the products of America's workers or farmers.

There is still many a voice raised in this country in behalf of the maintenance of a legitimate protection for the American producer's right to maintain the primary control of his own domestic market. So long as I am in my seat, regardless of any spotted or casual advantage which some group in my great Commonwealth may get from some particular trade bargain that may have been made in its behalf, I shall insist upon assessing this problem upon a national basis, and upon concluding, as I have always concluded, that there is no national basis upon which it can be assessed rightly and safely and soundly except a basis which protects America against the low costs of production abroad.

Mr. President, I repeat that of all times in the world's history, this is the worst to embark upon a wholesale tariff-lowering campaign which ignores the cost-of-production rule.

The spread in the cost of production at home and abroad is constantly growing wider. There are many contributing factors, all of them welcome to Americans who want the mass standards of living and of wage increases in this country. Among these factors are a shorter workweek, an increased wage scale, a rising price index on raw materials, and the pay-roll taxes that pay for social security. How are we to continue to have social security financed by pay-roll taxes if we are not to equalize those pay-roll taxes at the customhouse with a sufficiently protective rate to defend the American operation against cheap production abroad which does not have social security, and which does not have to pay the pay-roll tax?

There is a further factor, not so welcome but unavoidable, namely, increasing general taxation to pay for heavily increased governmental service. All these elements enter into the American cost of production on the farm, in the factory, in the mine, in the store, and everywhere.

Meanwhile, the costs of production abroad are going down still lower, thanks to our own exportation of our own mass production methods, of our mass production machinery, and of our mass production brains. The infinitely lower foreign unit of wage goes still lower, in terms of production, when it is linked up with these methods of wholesale production. The pressure against American commodities in their own domestic market increases in proportion. When we have caught up with the depression lag in our purchases, I seriously doubt whether our protected agriculture and our protected industry and our necessarily protected labor can stand the competition without a realistic protection at the customhouse. We could not do it in the past. We shall be even less able to do it in the future.

The truth of the matter is that our tariff rates, in terms of net effectiveness, are lower today than at any time since 1925. According to the United States Tariff Commission, the average percentage of rate to value on dutiable imports during the first 11 months of 1936 was 37.6. That compares with 59.1 percent in 1932 at peak. It is lower, thanks to higher costs, than at any time since 1925 when it was 37.6 percent. In other words, natural circumstances, plus some small influence of these trade agreements, already have driven our protection average lower than in the pre-Smoot-Hawley days.

Our imports are increasing far faster than our exports. Eliminating for the moment what effect the Hull policies may have upon this calculation, the fact is that from 1934 to 1935 our exports went up $149,000,000, but our imports went up $392,000,000. From 1935 to 1936 our exports went up $171,000,000, but our imports went up $372,000,000. These are merchandising figures. Of course, if we add silver and gold imports, the disparity already existing becomes positively staggering.

I know the internationalistic school of thought does not worry about our balance of trade. If anything, they are strangely comforted when they see it turning against us because, they say, we are now a "creditor nation" and should behave accordingly. I am not going to argue that proposition this afternoon, although it is my view that if a realistic count be taken of foreign investments in our good American securities, now probably totaling as high as $8,000,000,000, and if a realistic inventory be made of the market value of defaulted war debts that are owed to us, and if a realistic assessment runs against our purchase at fantastic prices of all the gold and silver offered in the world, we would not be a creditor but a debtor nation.

But whatever we are, to many of us a receding balance of trade—which progressively recedes at a rapid rate—is a danger signal in respect to the domestic economy. It is finally calculated to spell more jobs abroad and less jobs at home. After all, in the heyday of our former artificially swollen foreign trade, it accounted for an annual average of but 7 percent of our annual business. The great 93 percent was home trade in home commodities with home folks. I have the unreconstructed idea that this still is—and always must be—the backbone of our domestic prosperity. The American producer primarily needs, and primarily deserves, the American market. A receding balance of trade inevitably trends toward jeopardy for this great and vital 93 percent.

That is precisely what is happening today. In 1934 we had a favorable balance of trade in merchandise of $478,000,000; just 2 years ago. In 1935 it dropped to $235,000,000, just 1 year ago. In 1936 it hit the all-time low of 41 years—$34,000,000. And that is only half the story. If we took account of silver imports, the 1936 balance would be many millions against us already; and if we took account of gold, the adverse balance of international payments would be further increased by more than a billion dollars.

As for agriculture, which was supposed to be the chief beneficiary of this new arrangement through providing foreigners with greater power to buy our farm commodities, it is the chief victim of the plan. While nonagricultural exports have substantially increased, though not in line with imports, agriculture's exports were practically static in 1935 and actually decreased $38,000,000 in 1936. It is no wonder that most farm organizations view the situation critically.

I am unable to believe that this is healthy for America, or that this adverse trend can continue indefinitely without jeopardy. I fear that the present American trade agreement school of thought encourages this jeopardy, and that the present trade agreement formula—in the hands of earnest internationalists—multiplies it. I repeat that I do not believe that this is a time for general tariff reductions without regard to the difference in costs of production at home and abroad.

Indeed, Mr. President, we need new industries to help take up our employment. Inadequate tariffs and hostile trade agreements make the creation and nourishment of new industries difficult if not impossible. This is a particularly serious matter in respect to agriculture, where science is constantly striving to find new industrial uses for farm commodities, a process which probably is the most hopeful of all permanent and realistic farm relief formulae.

But just when American science and ingenuity find a way to make starch out of the sweetpotato, the State Department makes a trade agreement with the Netherlands which opens the domestic market to foreign starch. When American science and ingenuity find a way to make paper out of slash pine in the South the State Department makes a trade agreement with Canada which discourages this brave domestic effort. When American science and ingenuity develop a new process for making cotton rugs with hemp backs the State Department makes a trade agreement with Belgium which all but renders the domestic effort null and void. I am unable to believe, Mr. President, that this is the way to build America.

This brings me to the third general proposition which I wish briefly to discuss. The record likewise fails to prove that the trade agreements are accomplishing their intended purpose, if that purpose was to bring us full measure of compensation for the domestic privileges which we give to foreign nations. The record proves, on the contrary, that export trade often grows as well, and often better, without trade agreements than with them. I discuss the former proposition first.

The trade agreements are stimulating imports, Mr. President, faster than they are stimulating exports. The able Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], who now occupies the chair, himself knows, through the experience of the winter-vegetable growers in his own State of Florida, that there is a hazard to agriculture in these imports. He is one of those who have joined in an effort to see to it that, if there are to be further trade agreements, we shall not be traded out of our boots in this aspect.

The trade agreements, as I have said, are stimulating imports faster than they are stimulating exports. This disparity will disclose itself upon examination of the figures on comparative trade with any treaty country. I quote from The Trend of United States Foreign Trade, an official publication of the Department of Commerce. These figures compare the first 11 months of 1936 with the first 11 months of 1935 in respect to six countries with which trade agreements were operative all or most of last year.

Listen, Senators. The able Senator from Mississippi undertook to demonstrate with metaphor rather than mathematics the great advantage that we have gained from these agreements. Let us look at the last record for six of these major-agreement countries. Our exports to Belgium—that is, what we sent to them—fell off 1 percent, while our imports from Belgium—that is, what we bought in competition with our domestic production—increased 46 percent. I do not know what trade agreements had to do with that, but I do know that Belgium is a trade-agreement country; and it may be a coincidence or it may be the law of cause and effect, but, whichever it is, there is the record; and the amazing thing is that it is about like the record with respect to all the trade-agreement countries.

Our exports to Canada—that is, the advantage we are supposed to get out of this so-called bargaining—went up 17 percent; but our imports from Canada, which measure Canada's advantage, went up 30 percent.

Our exports to Cuba went up 11 percent but our imports from Cuba went up 19 percent.

Our exports to the Netherlands went up 7 percent but our imports from the Netherlands went up 22 percent.

Our exports to Sweden went up 9 percent but our imports from Sweden went up 21 percent.

In every instance, with the single exception of Brazil, our import increase with trade-agreement countries was greater than our export increase, and in every such instance the import increase was heavily greater than our 17-percent average increased imports in trade with all the countries of the world. Undoubtedly our so-called bargains were not the only influence upon this balance against us; but it certainly looks very decidedly as though we were getting the worst of the so-called bargains. In the case of Cuba, for example, the boasted stimulation in the first full treaty year showed our imports from Cuba to be up $67,000,000 while our exports to Cuba were up only $28,500,000. In other words, for every $1 of increased exports we have accepted $2.35 of increased imports, and this is typical of what is happening all along the line.

How many times we can repeat that sort of an economic victory and still be solvent, Mr. President, is beyond my comprehension.

Nor is this all the picture. These disparities, running heavily against us, count only the direct loss and gain. There is yet another loss, namely, the loss from the generalization of these American rate reductions to some 50 other nations which under the "most-favored-nation" formula, get all the American benefits which we grant in each individual contract without contracting any direct equivalent concessions in return. This loss is so far-flung and indefinable that it is impossible to estimate its influence upon our vanishing balance of trade; but we have some interesting collateral evidence in at least one instance.

Again I beg the Senate to listen. During the first 11 months of 1936 our exports to England were up 2 percent over the corresponding period of 1935; but our imports from England were up 24 percent, or just 12 times as much as the trade benefit flowing into the United States. In the face of such an exhibit, it is not surprising to hear the editors of the famous London Economist say:

> It is fully possible * * * that Great Britain has already gained more from the concessions made by the United States in her treaties with other countries than could be obtained in a direct Anglo-American treaty.

Mr. President, I am driven by all these exhibits to the irresistible conclusion that we are not "getting our money's worth" out of the Hull program; but that, on the contrary, we are once more "giving away America."

This leads me to the other point; namely, that it is not necessary to "give away America" in order to get foreign trade.

The impression is cultivated in some quarters that the expansion of our foreign trade is wholly or largely dependent upon these trade agreements under the Hull policy, and therefore that anyone who is critical of them is standing against foreign-trade expansion. The impression also is cultivated that our notably increased export trade during the past 2 years is essentially the result of these trade agreements. The facts warrant neither conclusion. There is no doubt that wise reciprocity in noncompetitive commodities can and does aid foreign trade; but the natural, normal resurgence of world trade following a world-wide depression is the paramount and dominating factor in both these considerations. The truth is that general world trade was on the upgrade before the Hull agreements were ever started. Indeed, the editors of this same journal, the London Economist, assert the following:

> It will be noticed that (American) trade with these 10 countries (the first 10 with which we negotiated agreements) was increasing more rapidly than trade with other countries in the year before the agreements came into force.

Remember that. Before the agreement came into force our export trade was increasing more rapidly with the particular countries with which we chose to make our first agreements. Then what happened? Here comes the astounding revelation from the same authentic source:

> But in the last year, with agreements in force, American export trade with other countries has actually increased faster than with the 10 treaty countries.

Illuminating proof may be particularized in respect to the export of automobiles. I have already indicated that automobile exports have had especially sympathetic treatment from the Hull negotiators, and that automobile producers, speaking officially for the automotive export trade before the Senate Finance Committee, endorsed the present law and asked for its extension. I must leave no doubt upon that score. But I very respectfully submit that automotive exports have increased to nontreaty countries quite as eloquently as to treaty countries—and that is my present point.

Exports of American motor vehicles to Belgium and the Belgian Congo, a treaty country, increased 76 percent from 1934 to 1936; but the same exports to New Zealand, a nontreaty country, increased 80 percent.

Exports of American motor vehicles to Cuba, a treaty country, increased 160 percent; but the same exports to Rumania, a nontreaty country with very unfavorable import permit restrictions, increased 350 percent.

These exports to Brazil, a treaty country, increased 20 percent. The same exports to Mexico increased 100 percent.

There are spectacular extremes at both ends of the line. For example, the automotive export to Canada leaped up enormously. On the other hand, even Australia—which is supposed to discriminate against our trade so heavily that it is one of two countries to which we refuse to generalize our "most-favored-nation" treatment—increased its imports 28 percent.

I do not claim that any such figures are conclusive. On the one hand, the Trade Agreement Act has not yet had time to be wholly effective. On the other hand, foreign purchasing power, like our own, is greatly affected by local vicissitudes. But I do claim that such figures as these invite the realistic conclusions that, first, world recovery is the great factor in increased exports and, second, that these so-called and often miscalled "bargains" are not indispensably prerequisite to our sharing in this recovery.

This is no reason for not striving through realistic negotiations to break down anti-American trade discriminations; nor is there ever any reason for not attempting always to increase our foreign trade. Of course, we want, and we shall cherish, all the foreign trade we can get. But I respectfully submit that it is a reason for being entirely practical in the candor with which we determine the virtue of the present trade-agreement program and the price which we are paying under it for the privilege of the experiment. It is not indispensable to increased export trade. It is not often productive in net values to America. It is frequently highly harmful to our domestic economy, as has been insistently urged, for example, by spokesmen for American cattle and wool and fruits and dairy products, and as will be increasingly apparent to our unemployed if a tariff differential honestly measuring the spread between cost of production at home and abroad is much longer seriously ignored.

Finally, Mr. President, let me dwell very swiftly upon a few of what I believe to be favorite fallacies which are earnestly sustained by those who have faith in them in respect to generally and substantially lower American tariffs, that being the apparent objective of the Hull program in keeping with the long-time low tariff views of the distinguished Secretary of State, to whom I pay the deserved compliment of being unwaveringly loyal and consistent in these views throughout the years.

When we talk of recaptured foreign trade, Mr. President, to the tune of four or five billion dollars, it is simply wishful thinking, and the quicker we get it out of our heads the more realistic we can be in building a firm export recovery. I repeat it is simply wishful thinking to talk about recovering a foreign trade of four or five billion dollars; indeed, the term "wishful thinking" was applied to this objective by none other than Mr. Chester A. Davis, late head of the Triple A, after a recent European study on the ground. The distinguished Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Henry A. Wallace, virtually admitted as much last week before the Senate Finance Committee. We had those enormous exports only in two eras; one when we fed nations at war, and the other when we financed our customers and lost most of the money. I am sure American citizens have no desire to duplicate either of those tragic experiences for the sake of gaining temporarily an abnormal export trade. The old trade in the old measure is not there to be recaptured in any such grand totals. It is further circumscribed by the fruits of an almost universal struggle for self-containment which is going on all around the globe, and is not calculated to stop just because of our neighborly gratuities. We must fit our trade ideas to the world as it is, and not dream away any part of our most priceless trade possessions, namely, the incomparably rich American domestic market.

Again, it is said that international trade is a two-way street and that we must buy if we would sell. The able Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] dwelt with some emphasis upon this proposition in his address this afternoon. It is partially true, and we shall always buy to an enormous extent certain noncompetitive raw materials and other commodities, but it is highly important to realize that it is not wholly true, because except as we do realize that it is not wholly true we will be led into certain specious conclusions, as was my able friend from Mississippi this afternoon. For example, in the 38 years from 1896 to 1933 our tourist expenditures and our immigrant remittances abroad amounted to more than $19,000,000,000. During the same period our shipping and freight services rendered to the world, plus our interest and dividend payments on foreigners' investments in the United States, totaled another $19,000,000,000. That is a total of $38,000,000,000 in 38 years in other things than imports available to balance foreign accounts. In other words, we do not have to balance every export with an import in order to sell the export.

Nor is that all. It has not been lack of money, Mr. President—and I beg of Senators to listen—nor lack of a medium of exchange which has prevented foreigners from buying our goods, and I might add, from paying their debts during the past few years. In 1935 they bought only $390,000,000 of our unmanufactured cotton and only $356,000,000 of all our other agricultural commodities. They did not have the money to buy any more our friends across the aisle may say; but they did have the money, Mr. President, for they found a way to buy $1,411,000,000 of our good securities and short-term accounts. In the first 9 months of 1936 they had only $448,000,000 to spend in our farm markets, but they had $870,000,000 to spend on our security exchanges. We do not have to sacrifice our domestic market in order to have an excellent and healthy export trade.

Then, moreover, there is another favorite fallacy to which I wish briefly to refer as I hasten on. It is constantly said that except as we deal with the tariff through these trade agreements the only alternative is to go back to the old log-rolling process of general tariff revision in Congress. I deny it. There is the other method which is in the law, for which I voted and for which I stand, and which I would trust in the hands of a Democratic President precisely as I did in the hands of a Republican President, namely, the elastic flexible tariff, under which the President, within limits of 50 percent, upon the recommendation of the United States Tariff Commission, can change rates as demonstrated to be necessary by the differential in cost of production at home and abroad.

I agree that we cannot put commerce in a straitjacket of a general tariff which has to be revised every 15 or 20 years; I agree that we do not want to leave our tariffs solely and exclusively at the mercy of a general revision; I agree that we ought to have as few general revisions as possible; but I assert that a courageous and sympathetic President—I mean "courageous and sympathetic" with the flexible tariff law—can use that law to level off any injustices that exist and can use it from day to day and month to month to recreate any protection that is essential in order to keep an American commodity alive, and under that law can bring about a living, dynamic trade which is static in no sense of the word whatever.

Lastly, Mr. President, I want to speak most respectfully of the latest and newest argument advanced for this Hull process, namely, that it encourages the peace of the world. In whatever degree it does it renders noble service; but I am unable to identify its blessings in any contemporary survey of the world today. Unquestionably economic pressure causes wars; unquestionably it is at the seat of much of Europe's unrest; but I submit that it is an economic pressure of so fundamental and nationalistic a nature that the comparatively inconsequential contributions which America may make in connection with these trade agreements are not calculated even remotely to be impressive or resultful. Furthermore, if the price of export trade should ever be a warrant that it must continue in time of war and that our neutrality must stand against it, then, so far as America's peace is concerned, it is a liability rather than an asset.

Mr. President, we are striving to stabilize economic conditions in the country in order that private business may the better be able to respond to the President's demand that private business shall absorb a greater number of the unemployed. It seems to me that wherever uncertainty can be driven out of the business equation, it ought to be our aim to drive it out. But the extension of the Trade Agreements Act for 3 years more, in its present "blank check" form, drives uncertainty into the equation, because no industry can make a long-range plan so long as it does not know at what moment the State Department negotiators may conclude, in their own academic wisdom, to strike down the tariff protection which alone makes many business operations possible. This process is the exact reverse of stabilization. Therefore it is the exact reverse of encouragement to domestic expansion and domestic reemployment.

Holding such views, much as I dislike to disagree with many of my friends in Michigan, they will expect me to oppose the extension of a measure which I believe to be both unconstitutional and unsound.

Mr. President, I thank the Senate for indulging me in this expression of my general viewpoint in respect to this problem. Before the consideration of the bill shall be concluded I shall offer three amendments: First, to reclaim to Congress its control over internal taxation, a power which has been usurped by the State Department under the Trade Agreements Act: second, a requirement that any trade agreements hereafter made under this extension, if it shall occur, must be made within the rule of American cost of production; and, third, an amendment requiring that there shall be realistic notification to American producers who may be jeopardized by contemplated changes in rates which are secretly agreed upon, in the closet of bureaucracy, without any effective opportunity for Americans to speak or fight for themselves. At the moment, as the pending question, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, and I shall postpone speaking on it until it comes to issue.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to insert at the end of the joint resolution the following proviso:

Provided, That after the enactment of this joint resolution no trade agreement shall include any provision in any way undertaking to limit the power of Congress over internal taxes.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I regret exceedingly that I cannot support in its present form the pending joint resolution to extend for the 3 years the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act.

My vote on the original act, in favor of its passage, is one evidence that I give more than lip service when I reiterate what I said at that time. I believe in extending our foreign trade. I believe that one of the ways is through reciprocal-trade agreements with other nations.

I will state frankly, however, that when I voted for the original measure, now before us for extension through the pending joint resolution, I did so with grave misgivings on two points.

In the first place, I doubted the wisdom—I will say nothing of the constitutionality—of the provision by which these agreements would be binding simply by action of the Chief Executive. It seemed to me at the time that it would have been better and more in keeping with the spirit of our Constitution and of our form of government to make the agreements subject to ratification by the Senate, the same as formal treaties. As to this granting of legislative powers to the Executive, I had rather serious doubts at the time.

There also was some doubt in my mind, although not as serious as that regarding the wisdom of giving sole power to the Chief Executive to ratify these agreements, as to whether the unconditional most-favored-nation clause should be used in these agreements.

But I resolved these doubts, Mr. President, in favor of the original act. I voted to give these powers to the executive department; I discarded in my own mind the possibilities that we might get the worst of it in some instances through abuse of the most-favored-nation clause, and voted for the bill.

My reasons for so voting I considered good at that time. I still consider them good. It has been my steadfast policy in the Senate to vote for whatever measures I believed might help agriculture and might help the people of my native State of Kansas and the best interests of the country. I had strong hopes that turning this treaty-making power—for that is what it is, even though this act may be in legal language termed a "trade agreement" rather than a "treaty"—I repeat, I had strong hopes that this treaty-making power in the hands of the Executive would be used to improve the export markets for agricultural products.

The prosperity of my State and of my section of the country, Mr. President, has been in great measure dependent upon foreign markets for some of its products. In even greater measure, however, it is dependent upon the domestic market. We feel that our farmers are entitled to the domestic market for our wheat and other products of the farm up to the limit of their ability to supply that market. Also we know that our surplus production, beyond the needs and demands of the domestic market, must be marketed abroad or that surplus production will depress the domestic market prices to the point where our farmers will lack purchasing power. When the farmers of this Nation, Mr. President, lack purchasing power, it is inevitable that there will be bread lines in the cities, as well as distress and misery on our farms.

It is not my intention to go into a discussion of the farm problem at this time beyond stating it was my hope and the hope of our people of Kansas and the great Midwest that this power to negotiate and to ratify trade agreements, this power placed in the hands of the Executive and taken from the Senate, would be wisely used to better the condition of agriculture as well as of industry.

That hope, Mr. President, has been disappointed. Whatever the effects of the act as administered may have been upon other producers and industries, and I understand there are differences of opinion on that point, I do not believe it can be fairly asserted that agriculture has been benefited directly by these treaties. While I have great respect for the opinions of Secretary Henry A. Wallace on agriculture, it did not seem to me that he made his point before the finance committee when he contended that the indirect benefits to agriculture through increased employment in manufacturing would in the long run more than offset the losses due to the domestic market being supplied with farm products from farmers of other nations.

It is my belief that agriculture has suffered some distinct losses and has been placed at serious disadvantage by the terms of the agreements which have been made effective to date. Also, in view of the agreements already made, I can see no good reason for believing, or even for hoping, that future agreements will be more favorable to agriculture than those which already have been made. I have read most of the testimony given before the House Ways and Means Committee. I have paid close attention to the testimony before the Senate Finance Committee, of which I am a member. I can only conclude from these hearings that the trade agreements have been a detriment, not a benefit, to the farmers of Kansas and of the Nation.

Mr. President, the national farm organizations and the leaders of these organizations have reached the same conclusion that I have reached. Representatives of several industries, of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, and of various departments of the national administration in power appeared before the Senate and House committees in support of the pending joint resolution to extend the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act for another 3 years.

But, Mr. President, I heard no representative of agriculture, aside from the Secretary of Agriculture, asking the members of the Senate Finance Committee to recommend this joint resolution for passage. I failed to find in the report of the hearings before the House Ways and Means Committee any record of any farmer or farm-organization leader appearing in support of the joint resolution to extend these powers without limitation for another 3 years.

On the contrary, farm representatives appeared before these committees and opposed the adoption of this resolution. Mr. Fred Brenckman, representing the National Grange; Mr. Charles W. Holman, representing the National Milk Producers' Federation; Mr. John D. Miller, president of the National Cooperative Council; Mr. A. L. Loomis, representing the National Dairy Union—all these went on record, as representatives of their respective organization, in opposition to the joint resolution.

Also, I invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that F. E. Mollin, president of the American Livestock Association, appeared before the Senate committee in opposition to the joint resolution, and that briefs in opposition were filed with the Senate committee by E. H. Everson, head of the National Farmers' Union, and by Robin Hood, secretary-treasurer of the National Cooperative Council, in opposition to the joint resolution as it is written.

Mr. President, these representatives of the great farm organizations, like myself, are not opposed to expansion of our foreign trade. They are not opposed to reciprocal-trade agreements. But in the main they take the position that such trade agreements should be ratified by the Senate before they become effective. They take the position that the trade agreements should not contain the most-favored-nation clause. They take the position that it is not sound public policy to trade off the domestic market for farm products in exchange for foreign markets for manufactured products.

Now these farm organizations did not come before the Senate and House committee merely presenting their own personal views. They appeared as representatives of their organizations. They spoke for their organizations, and I desire at this point in my remarks to include the official actions of some of these organizations in regard to the trade agreements.

The following resolution was adopted by the National Grange at its annual meeting in Columbus, Ohio, on November 11, 1936:

Whereas it appears likely that Congress may reenact legislation authorizing the Department of State to enter into reciprocal-trade agreements with other nations, which authority expires on June 12, 1937: Therefore be it

Resolved, That while we favor any expansion of foreign trade which is advantageous to our people, we are persuaded that so long as the protection system prevails, the American farmer is entitled to the American market, so far as he is able to supply the demand; and be it further

Resolved, That in the event of the renewal of this act, trade treaties with other nations should be ratified by the United States Senate before taking effect. Such treaties should not contain the unconditional most-favored-nation clause, under which policy we gain concessions from one nation while making concessions to practically all other nations producing and exporting any given commodity.

The National Cooperative Council, which is a Nation-wide organization composed of all leading farm cooperatives, adopted the following resolution at its annual meeting in Washington, January 9, 1937:

As stated in the resolutions of the National Cooperative Council of last year, the sound policy for agriculture in relation to our foreign trade is to maintain all of the domestic markets for American farmers with regard to products produced within the United States and to encourage our farmers to produce products which will take the place of those now being imported whenever such a procedure is practicable. It is also essential to the continued prosperity of our people that every sound effort be made to regain and to expand our foreign-trade outlets, particularly outlets for agricultural products.

The record of our foreign trade for the first 10 months of last year makes it very questionable as to whether the present trade-agreement program of our Government is in the best interest of agriculture. The adverse balance of total trade as between the United States and the first six nations with which we have signed trade agreements during this period has increased to nearly $90,000,000. Looking toward the end of developing foreign trade, if the policy of trade agreements is to be continued, the following changes should be made in the act of June 12, 1934:

1. The right of the Senate to ratify trade agreements should be restored.

2. General application of tariff benefits should be abandoned so that only the nations signatory to such agreements should obtain their benefits.

3. Public hearings should be held on trade agreements before they are completed by whatever authority considers them.

The State Department should refrain from negotiating any further reductions in import duties on agricultural products, in binding agricultural products on the free list, and in binding the Federal Government not to increase nor levy internal taxes upon imported products which directely or indirectly compete with those produced on farms in the United States. The Congress should not shrink from abandoning the most-favored-nation clauses in most of the treaties which the United States has signed with other nations.

The American National Live Stock Association adopted the following resolutions at its fortieth annual meeting, held at El Paso, Tex., in January 1937:

Whereas the reduction in tariff on cattle in the Canadian reciprocal-trade agreement and the extension of the same reduction to imports from Mexico has been one of the major factors in causing a sharp decline in cattle prices, as a careful examination of official Government market reports clearly indicates; and

Whereas the tariff on agricultural products has been reduced to increase the export of industrial products; and

Whereas these imports have been received in such manner as to effect a decline out of all proportion to the actual numbers involved: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we urge that the Reciprocal Trade Act be repealed or that all treaties negotiated under it be subject to ratification by a two-thirds vote of the United States Senate; and be it further

Resolved, That we request that until the act is repealed or the Canadian agreement is nullified or expires the imports of cattle under this agreement should be placed on a weekly or monthly quota for 1937, in order to prevent dumping of large numbers on our markets in a short period, as was done in the spring of 1936.

The American Farm Bureau Federation adopted the following resolution concerning the reciprocal-trade treaties at its annual convention held in Pasadena, Calif., December 11, 1936:

We reaffirm our support of reciprocal-trade treaties which are negotiated primarily to restore agricultural exports by judicious lowering of industrial tariffs, thus admitting more goods into this country and making it possible for us to sell more of our farm products abroad.

We insist that this principle be adhered to in framing reciprocal-trade treaties and that there be no reduction in present agricultural tariffs on any farm product that would have the effect of holding or reducing domestic price levels below parity on such product. We insist that prior to the conclusion of agreements opportunity be afforded official representatives of farmers to be heard in public hearings on questions at interest and that the most-favored-nation clause be eliminated.

Countries enjoying wide outlets in the American market of commodities on the free list should be effectively encouraged in large part to take in exchange commodities produced in the United States which they require.

Mr. President, why have these great farm organizations taken their positions either against extending the reciprocal-trade agreements at all or at least against the extension of the act unless it is properly safeguarded by, first, requiring Senate ratification, and, second, elimination of the most-favored-nation clause from the agreements?

They have not taken these positions because they are opposed to expansion of our foreign trade. They are in favor of expansion of our foreign trade.

They have not taken their positions because they are opposed to the principle of reciprocal-trade agreements. They are in favor of reciprocal-trade agreements as a means of breaking down trade barriers.

They have not taken their positions because they are opposed to the administration in power; in fact, a considerable part of the membership have supported this administration. They have taken these positions because they not only know that the trade agreements have failed to get the results hoped for but they also realize that the results attained have been, in the main, unfavorable to agriculture and inimical to the interests of the farmers of the United States.

Mr. President, the situation of agriculture is much better than it was a few years ago. Many of the measures taken by this administration have contributed to this better position of agriculture. I make the assertion, however, that this administration's tariff policy—and its tariff policy is summed up in the reciprocal-trade agreements, because otherwise it has not made one move toward changing the tariff policies of the preceding Republican administrations—has not contributed in the least toward better conditions for farmers and for agriculture.

We have a good test for this assertion in the official figures showing the trend in foreign trade in farm products since 1934. If these figures showed an increase in agricultural exports, as was hoped by those who advocated the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act in 1934—and I was one of those who supported that act in the hope that it would work benefits—then it could be said that as to those crops the act has been measurably, at least, successful. If the act had been so administered that there had not been an increase in competitive agricultural imports, then at least it could be asserted that the act had been successful in negative fashion.

But unfortunately for the farmer—and unfortunately for those who contend that the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act has helped agriculture—the records show that farm exports have not increased. I desire to place in the RECORD, in support of this assertion, a table, which I ask leave to insert in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ELLENDER in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CAPPER. These figures show not an increase in exports of agricultural products but a decrease. The actual experience of the past 2 years does not indicate that agriculture has benefited from increased exports. So, whatever the reciprocal-trade agreements have accomplished, they have not given us increased markets for farm products abroad; and most certainly the reciprocal-trade agreements have not been accompanied by any decrease in imports of farm products from abroad. Not only have the trade agreements failed to benefit agriculture positively; they have been accompanied by, if they have not actually caused, increases in imports of certain farm products. I may be wrong, but it is my contention that every pound or other unit of competitive farm products imported takes away just that much of the domestic market from the American farmer; and I also say that the American farmer is entitled to the American market for his products so long as he is able to supply the needs of the American market.

But do not take this on my say-so. Let us look at the record. I ask to have included in the RECORD at this point as part of my remarks a table taken from the Statistical Abstract of the Monthly Summary of Foreign Commerce, from the Department of Commerce, showing imports of certain articles in 1933, 1934, 1935, and the first 11 months of 1936.

Mr. CAPPER. The table dealing with imports which I have placed in the RECORD I will summarize briefly by stating that practically without exception it shows increases in agricultural imports during the entire period the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act has been in effect.

In regard to cattle I will state that the importations of cattle into this county for 1934 were 66,138 head; in 1935 the importations totaled 378,124 head; in 1936 there were more than 400,000 head imported.

There is considerable distress among our cattlemen over the effect of the Canadian agreement, which lowered the tariff on 150,000 head of cattle imported each year. There may be some merit in the contention that this is such a small percentage of the total slaughter that it should not affect prices materially, but the fact seems to be just the contrary. These imports do affect prices and affect them unfavorably.

The trouble is that these Canadian cattle seem to be thrown on the American market in large numbers, and the effect is to drive prices downward. I am going to quote from the testimony of Mr. F. E. Mollin, of Denver, representing the American National Livestock Association, as to the effect of the Canadian agreement on the cattle market. He is an authority on the subject. I do not claim to be an authority. In answer to a question, Mr. Mollin told the Finance Committee:

> Seventy and two-tenths percent of the quota of 155,799 head of cattle weighing more than 700 pounds as established in the Canadian agreement, or 109,408 head, entered this country in the 4 months March to June, inclusive. This is, last spring 24¾ percent, or 37,887 head, entered in the month of April alone. Large numbers of these cattle were received at the St. Paul and Buffalo markets. I have carefully examined the official Government reports as to market conditions at St. Paul during the months in question, and find repeated instances where from 50 to 125 loads of Canadian cattle were received at that market on Monday, and in almost every instance the market slumped sharply with trading very slow and considerable numbers held over. Our central market system is such that a condition of this kind on any one market is immediately reflected by wire to all the other markets and hence my statement that the Canadian importations had an influence on price out of all proportion to the actual numbers involved.
> Now, I have here a statement which I prepared last summer. It is based on the official records of the St. Paul market, official Government reports, and I would like to have it put in the record without taking the time or opportunity to read it.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD at this point, without taking the time of the Senate to read it, the matter referred to by Mr. Mollin.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

EFFECT OF CANADIAN IMPORTATIONS ON DOMESTIC CATTLE MARKETS

St. Paul, Monday, Apr. 6, 1936

Cattle receipts, South St. Paul---------- 5,600
Total cattle receipts for 7 markets (South St. Paul, Chicago, Kansas City, Omaha, East St. Louis, St. Joseph, Sioux City) ---------- 44,600
Actual cattle receipts (7 markets) week ago---------- 55,556
Actual cattle receipts (7 markets) year ago---------- 42,631

St. Paul: Receipts Canadian cattle about 80 cars, some of these being holdovers from late last week. Trade at a standstill during much of the forenoon, despite decrease in supplies around the Midwestern market circle. Clearance still incomplete at most points around the noon hour, as salesmen felt additional declines lacked justification.

Chicago: Moderate receipts of cattle more than offset the depressing influence of religious holidays. At the finish, some weakness had crept into the trade and sales of medium- and lower-grade steers indicated that most of the early strength had disappeared.

St. Paul, Monday, Apr. 13, 1936

Cattle receipts, South St. Paul---------- 3,500
Total cattle receipts for 7 markets (South St. Paul, Chicago, Kansas City, Omaha, East St. Louis, St. Joseph, Sioux City) ---------- 46,500
Actual cattle receipts (7 markets) week ago---------- 46,169
Actual cattle receipts (7 markets) year ago---------- 46,937

St. Paul: Canadian receipts some 55 cars, part of these holdover from Saturday. Market mostly steady on medium-grade fed steers; 10 to 15 cents lower on better grades. Many loads still in first hands as afternoon opened.

Chicago: Market ruled 15 to 25 cents lower on kinds of value to sell at $8.50 upward. Comparative scarcity led the handful of lower grades to sell not only steady but rather actively at $8 downward.

St. Paul, Wednesday, Apr. 15, 1936

Cattle receipts, South St. Paul---------- 4,300
Total cattle receipts for 7 markets (South St. Paul, Chicago, Kansas City, Omaha, East St. Louis, St. Joseph, Sioux City) ---------- 28,100
Actual cattle receipts (7 markets) week ago---------- 23,044
Actual cattle receipts (7 markets) year ago---------- 25,045

St. Paul: Canadian receipts around 60 cars. Slaughter steers and fed yearlings comprised the greatest share of the day's run. Most sales 15 to 25 cents lower, but some bids showed greater downturns, and numerous carloads were still unsold around 1:30 p. m.

St. Paul, Monday, Apr. 20, 1936

Cattle receipts, South St. Paul---------- 6,900
Total cattle receipts for 7 markets (South St. Paul, Chicago, Kansas City, Omaha, East St. Louis, St. Joseph, Sioux City) ---------- 63,600
Actual cattle receipts (7 markets) week ago---------- 48,837
Actual cattle receipts (7 markets) year ago---------- 50,615

St. Paul: Canadians, about 125 cars on hand, part of these being hold-overs. The only question about lower prices was apparently a matter of degree or extent, most buyers favoring a flat 50-cent reduction for slaughter steers, while salesmen felt that around 25 cents was more nearly justified and trading was very slow to be established, with the greater share of steers and yearlings still unsold about noon. Limited selling was at 25 to 50 cents lower levels.

St. Paul, Thursday, Apr. 23, 1936

Cattle receipts, South St. Paul---------- 4,600
Total cattle receipts for 7 markets (South St. Paul, Chicago, Kansas City, Omaha, East St. Louis, St. Joseph, Sioux City) ---------- 23,000
Actual cattle receipts (7 markets) week ago---------- 21,935
Actual cattle receipts (7 markets) year ago---------- 18,704

St. Paul: Receipts, Canadians, approximated 60 loads, largely steers of medium and lower grades. Trade was draggy on the general run of slaughter steers, barely steady mostly, although strictly corn-fed native steer yearlings worked out firm, due partly to scarcity.

Chicago: Canada had cattle here, mainly through St. Paul. The small run of Canadians here sold at $7.25 to $8.35 but other markets, notably St. Paul, saw a liberal run of "canucks", there being approximately 125 loads at that market on Monday, as well as 1,300 head at Buffalo. Thus the crop of Canadian cattle was an item in beef tonnage figures even if a moderate supply is being moved direct to Corn Belt feed lots.

St. Paul, Monday, Apr. 27, 1936

Cattle receipts, South St. Paul---------- 6,200
Total cattle receipts for 7 markets (South St. Paul, Chicago, Kansas City, Omaha, East St. Louis, St. Joseph, Sioux City) ---------- 47,800
Actual cattle receipts (7 markets) week ago---------- 64,286
Actual cattle receipts (7 markets) year ago---------- 41,399

St. Paul: Canadians, about 110 loads, mostly steers, with some she stock. Slaughter steer and yearling trade was slow, but most sales worked out about steady. Undertone weak on the part of big killers, especially for the bulk of medium-grade Canadian steers.

Chicago: Most of the crop were medium to good-grade steers of value to sell at $9.25 down late last week—this is what the cattle brought today on a steady to strong, but very slow, market.

Chicago, Thursday, Apr. 30, 1936

Not only natives but Canadians are running rather freely, most of the latter cattle stopping at St. Paul and Buffalo.

St. Paul, Monday, May 4, 1936

Cattle receipts, South St. Paul---------- 5,600
Total cattle receipts for 7 markets (South St. Paul, Chicago, Kansas City, Omaha, East St. Louis, St. Joseph, Sioux City)---------- 50,100
Actual cattle receipts (7 markets) week ago---------- 45,826
Actual cattle receipts (7 markets) year ago---------- 43,868

Chicago, Wednesday, May 6, 1936

As partly explaining the recent beef pile-up, the trade is pointing to recent liberal runs of Canadian cattle at Buffalo and St. Paul. A good many Canadian steers at Buffalo had to be carried over on last Monday's market when other trade centers were congested. Fat cattle are also moving freely out of the Lancaster, Pa., district, part of these being originally Canadians, according to unofficial reports.

St. Paul, Thursday, May 7, 1936

Cattle receipts, South St. Paul---------- 4,500
Total cattle receipts for 7 markets (South St. Paul, Chicago, Kansas City, Omaha, East St. Louis, St. Joseph, Sioux City)---------- 23,900
Actual cattle receipts (7 markets) week ago---------- 21,293
Actual cattle receipts (7 markets) year ago---------- 14,995

St. Paul: Receipts, Canadians, 75 cars, mostly steers. A few better finished yearling steers and heifers sold early at near steady rates. Otherwise the market was hardly established on the majority of slaughter steers and butcher she stock before the noon hour. Scattered sales appeared around 25 cents lower, with bids mostly that much or more off, and the bulk of the supply still in first hands around 12:30 p. m. and numerous loads of steers still without bids.

Chicago: The fed and yearling trade more nearly approached a state of complete collapse than at any time within recent weeks. While steers were more affected than other classes, there was a pronounced break all through the list. Canadian steers ran freely at St. Paul and Buffalo, but only five or six loads showed up locally to sell at $7.25 to $7.40.

St. Paul, Monday, May 11, 1936

Cattle receipts, South St. Paul---------- 4,300
Total cattle receipts for 7 markets (South St. Paul, Chicago, Kansas City, Omaha, East St. Louis, St. Joseph, Sioux City)---------- 35,400
Actual cattle receipts (7 markets) week ago---------- 52,615
Actual cattle receipts (7 markets) year ago---------- 38,981

St. Paul: Canadians, about 60 cars, some of these being holdovers. Buyers were practically without interest in fresh purchases except at material and in some sharp reductions, while salesmen had anticipated recovering part of last week's sharp losses due to lighter receipts. Bids were frequently as much as 50 cents off on the rank and file of steers and yearlings, and the majority still in first hands when the afternoon began.

St. Paul, Monday May 25, 1936

Cattle receipts, South St. Paul---------- 4,700
Total cattle receipts for 7 markets (South St. Paul, Chicago, Kansas City, Omaha, East St. Louis, St. Joseph, Sioux City) ---------- 43,300
Actual cattle receipts (7 markets), week ago---------- 34,945
Actual cattle receipts (7 markets), year ago---------- 45,181

St. Paul: Canadians, about 60 loads, mostly steers of medium quality and finish. Weightier steers, particularly lower quality offerings, were harder to move, and many were still unsold around the noon hour, Canadians included, resisting weak to lower bids.

St. Paul, Monday, June 1, 1936

Cattle receipts, South St. Paul---------- 6,500
Total cattle receipts for 7 markets (South St. Paul, Chicago, Kansas City, Omaha, East St. Louis, St. Joseph, Sioux City) ---------- 47,400
Actual cattle receipts (7 markets), week ago---------- 43,759
Actual cattle receipts (7 markets), year ago---------- 43,639

St. Paul: Canadians, 78 loads. With supplies running largely to slaughter steers, that part of the trade was very draggy. Limited sales occurred around 25 cents lower, with finished yearlings or steers about 900 pounds down showing less decline, while long yearlings and weightier beeves received bids up to about 40 cents off, and the majority of all offerings still unsold around 1 p. m.

St. Paul, Monday, June 15, 1936

Cattle receipts, South St. Paul	5,800
Total cattle receipts for 7 markets (South St. Paul, Chicago, Kansas City, Omaha, East St. Louis, St. Joseph, Sioux City)	45,700
Actual cattle receipts (7 markets), week ago	44,393
Actual cattle receipts (7 markets), year ago	36,160

St. Paul: Canadians, 75 cars, largely weightier steers. Weights around 1,000 pounds down developed about steady prices, while heavier kinds remained draggy and weak, with bids frequently lower and many still in first hands when the afternoon began.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, there is one other point in relation to the livestock industry upon which I wish to dwell briefly. I understand it will be discussed in more detail by other Members of the Senate. This is the matter of sanitary regulations.

At the present time we have embargoes against imports of livestock from some twoscore nations in which the dread foot-and-mouth disease is prevalent. Mr. President, those restrictions should be retained. In the United States we maintain high standards of health for animals which are to be slaughtered for human consumption. The same high standards should be effective on imports of animals or meats for human consumption.

It is possible, as I understand the situation, for these trade agreements to abrogate or mitigate, or at least pave the way for the abrogation or mitigation, of these sanitary requirements on imports.

We can see what is in prospect if we take a look at the proposed Argentine Sanitary Convention, now pending before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. This convention would let down the bars, in some degree at least, against imports of cattle, sheep, beef, and mutton from the Argentine, where there is considerable foot-and-mouth disease.

It is not my intention to discuss the proposed Sanitary Convention at this time. I merely desire to point out that this Sanitary Convention cannot become effective without ratification by the Senate. But if it were included in one of these reciprocal-trade agreements—I am not saying it will be—the Senate would have nothing whatever to say about its going into effect, because, when we adopt the pending joint resolution, the Senate will have given over to the executive department the power the people gave the Senate to protect the livestock industry of this country against foot-and-mouth disease.

Mr. President, it seems to me this is a case in point that makes it imperative upon the Senate to adopt my amendment to the joint resolution. That amendment would require ratification by the Senate of each of these trade agreements before they can become effective.

It does not seem to me necessary to elaborate upon this point. It is intended by the Constitution that the Senate should pass upon treaties, and in effect these trade agreements are treaties, as so clearly shown in the remarks of the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Idaho.

I desire also to point out that 13 of the 15 nations with which the State Department has negotiated these trade agreements require ratification by their parliaments before the trade agreements become effective. The Canadians are too intelligent to allow a trade agreement to become effective until their Parliament ratifies it. Surely we ought to exercise the same care in protecting the rights of our own citizens.

I am frankly of the opinion that the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act as it stands puts entirely too much power in the hands of the Executive and surrenders not only the power of the Senate to pass on these agreements but also its responsibility. The statute represents an undue delegation of legislative authority. As I said at the beginning of these remarks, I had grave doubts when the original act came before the Senate as to the wisdom and the validity of this part of the act, but I resolved those doubts in favor of the measure. This I did in the hope—I am sorry that it seems to have been a vain hope—that the power would be used to help a distressed American agriculture. Now that we know it has not had that effect, I say the time has come for the Senate to recapture the power it gave away in 1934. And I hope that a majority of the Senate will take this view of the matter.

Further, Mr. President, I am opposed to continuing the power of the executive branch of the Government to incorporate the most-favored-nation clause in these trade agreements. As I understand, we have obtained trading concessions—such as they are, they certainly have not benefited agriculture—but in return we have granted concessions to some 70 nations, of which only some 15 have granted similar concessions to us.

Mr. President, I have taken more time than I intended. It is a matter of regret to me that I cannot support the joint resolution to extend the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act for another 3 years. I certainly cannot support the joint resolution unless it is changed in two vital respects.

First. All such agreements should be subject to ratification by the Senate. I would be willing to provide that they become effective upon failure of the Senate to act within a reasonable time after the agreements are presented to the Senate. But by all means the power to act should be returned to the Senate.

Second. The power of the executive branch to incorporate the most-favored-nation clause in these agreements should be abrogated. The provisions of the agreements should be restricted to apply only to articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the foreign country with which the agreement is entered into.

These two amendments, Mr. President, are proposed in good faith for the purpose of strengthening the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, not for the purpose of weakening it. I desire at this time to reiterate my hearty sympathy with and complete approval of the doctrine of trade reciprocity.

It is my desire to make the doctrine of reciprocity effective by requiring reciprocal agreements only. The United States, under my proposal, would make certain concessions to some other nation in the matter of import restrictions. That nation would reciprocate by making us certain concessions. But we would not make concessions to 70 nations in return for concessions made to us by 14 or 15 nations.

I sincerely hope that the Senate will decide to accept these two proposals offered by me, and thus provide proper safeguards in the public interest, before it extends the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act for 3 years, as provided in the pending joint resolution.

ORDER FOR CONSIDERATION OF CALENDAR TOMORROW

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that tomorrow after the conclusion of the morning business the Senate shall proceed to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. HATCH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of Sam E. Whitaker, of Chattanooga, Tenn., to be Assistant Attorney General of the United States to fill an existing vacancy.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ELLENDER in the chair). The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state in order the nominations on the calendar.

HIGH COMMISSIONER TO THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Paul V. McNutt, of Indiana, to be United States High Commissioner to the Philippine Islands.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I noted in the newspapers a day or two ago that some objection was made to the appointment of Governor McNutt to the position of United States High Commissioner to the Philippine Islands. I was wondering whether the Senator in charge of this nomination could tell us anything about the situation. As I remember, the objection was based on Governor McNutt's record as a militarist.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], the chairman of the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, does not seem to be in the Chamber at the present time.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the criticism referred to by the Senator, which appeared in the newspapers, is merely a charge against Governor McNutt by a man named Libby, who is connected with some sort of peace organization in this country, to the effect that he had used force in some way in connection with a labor dispute in Indiana. It was merely a newspaper article, as I understand. The man did not come before the committee to protest against the nomination. He made no representation about it until after Governor McNutt had been appointed, and then only in a newspaper article, which I think was in substance what I have just stated.

Mr. FRAZIER. Can the Senator tell me whether or not Governor McNutt, while in office in Indiana, did call out the militia in labor disputes?

Mr. BARKLEY. I, myself, do not know whether he did or not.

Mr. ROBINSON. Was the report of the committee unanimous?

Mr. BARKLEY. It is my understanding that the report was unanimous.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in answer to the question of the Senator from Arkansas, there was no formal meeting of the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs to consider this nomination, but I believe the chairman contacted all the members of the committee. I know he contacted me, and I saw the report, which was signed, so far as I know, by substantially all of the members of the committee. I do not mean to say that every Senator on the committee signed the report, but my recollection is that nearly all had signed when the report was presented to me. I do not know, I repeat, whether or not the report was unanimous, but there was no objection.

I may add that I received a communication yesterday through the mail, as I recall, from an organization the name of which I have forgotten, in which a protest was made against the nomination of Governor McNutt.

Mr. VAN NUYS. Mr. President, in answer to the query of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER], let me say that Governor McNutt did on some occasions call out the militia owing to widespread strikes in the State of Indiana, just as the present Governor of Indiana, Governor Townsend, put the entire county of Madison, in which the city of Anderson is located, under military rule on account of violence being committed there.

Governor McNutt is a man who has served his State as Governor in the most acceptable manner. He cooperated with the National Government in all relief work. He was formerly dean of the law school of the State university, and he is equipped both as a diplomat and as an executive for the high office to which he has been nominated.

I am familiar with the complaint of which the Senator speaks. It was simply a publicity stunt, the complaint being given to the newspapers even before the letter was addressed to the President, and I doubt whether it will receive any recognition or acknowledgment from the White House.

I underwrite Governor McNutt from every angle for the high position to which he has been nominated.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I am glad to hear the endorsement of the Senator from Indiana of this nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to this nomination?

The nomination was confirmed.

GOVERNOR OF PANAMA CANAL

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Col. Clarence S. Ridley, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, to be Governor of the Panama Canal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

PUBLIC WORKS ADMINISTRATION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of David R. Kennicott to be State director, Illinois.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask that the nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

IN THE ARMY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Raymond Franklin Metcalfe to be assistant to the Surgeon General.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1937

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Thou infinite God, our Father, we thank Thee for all the light which has fallen upon the earth. By the inspiration of this sacred moment may we be prepared to meet the obligations of this day. Blessed Lord, the whole work of life and its contests represent the struggles and the aspirations of man; may we put ourselves under Thy guidance. Hide not Thy face from us in the time of our need; in the day when we call, answer us speedily. Let not the sun stand a thousand years in the firmament until the rulers of earth bring Thee their glory and in Thy light may the nations walk. Heavenly Father, another Member has fallen. He was pronounced in his convictions and pure in motives. He served his State and country with fidelity and singleness of purpose. Comfort all those who knew and loved him. In the name of our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE JAMES P. BUCHANAN

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 128

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. JAMES P. BUCHANAN, a Representative from the State of Texas.

Resolved, That a committee of 10 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provision of these resolutions and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] be recognized.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, when the news of Gladstone's death reached London the British Cabinet was in session. A secretary handed the memorandum to the Premier, and the Premier, reading the announcement to the Cabinet, said, "We have lost a great man." Mr. Balfour, the First Lord of the Treasury, who was sitting beside him, said, "It is worse than that; we have lost a friend." I am certain every Member of the House who has been associated with Chairman BUCHANAN in his long and eventful and distinguished service here echoes that sentiment this morning. He was not only a man of commanding ability but he was one of the most lovable men in the House. He dies as he would have preferred to die—and as he would have expressed it—"with his spurs on and riding hard." His physician, his family, his secretaries, his friends urged him to husband his strength, but there was work to be done, important work to be done, work which no one else could do so well, and so he gave what might have been the last and best years of his life to do it.

Mr. Speaker, the Nation has lost a faithful and efficient public servant, and we have lost a friend. I heartily concur with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SANDERS] in the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Chair will designate the members of the committee provided for by the resolution after the adjournment and announce the names through the press. The Clerk will report the remainder of the resolution.

ADJOURNMENT

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, February 24, 1937, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1937

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God, whose mercy is as great as our unworthiness, by whose command the order of all time doth run its course: Forgive, we beseech Thee, the impatience of our unbelief, and make perfect that which is lacking in our faith, that we may learn alike from joy and pain the blessedness of fellowship with Thee, and become interpreters of the higher life to those who know Thee not.

We ask not to escape from trouble but for grace to rise victorious over it; we come before Thee not as mere seekers of peace but as men who desire to be makers of peace by contending for equity and justice and the kingdom of God and His righteousness. So guide us in our deliberations that when evening comes, and our task is done, we may have that peace which passeth all understanding. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

BONNEVILLE ELECTRIC POWER PROJECT, OREGON (S. DOC. NO. 21)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a progress report of the committee on national power policy (appointed by him on the 18th ultimo) on the Bonneville project, situated on the Columbia River, Oreg., which was read, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, February 24, 1937.

MY DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: As you know, the Bonneville project is nearing completion, and I am informed by the War Department that the first electric power will probably be available for public distribution late this year.

It seems necessary, therefore, to enact legislation at this session of the Congress setting up machinery for the administration of the dam, locks, fishways, and power plant of that project. Such legislation should be of a provisional character pending the establishment of permanent administration of Bonneville and other Federal projects in the Columbia Basin, but should not be inconsistent with national power policies which may be hereafter adopted.

On January 18 I appointed a committee on national power policy and requested the committee as its first assignment to make suggestions for the administration of the Bonneville project. The committee has submitted its recommendations, which I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress. I approve the recommendations and believe that they merit careful consideration.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

The Honorable the VICE PRESIDENT,
Washington, D. C.

COURT ORDERS RESTRAINING ENFORCEMENT OF LAWS

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Oregon, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

House Joint Memorial 9

To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

We, your memorialists, the Thirty-ninth Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, convened in regular session, respectively represent that:

Whereas the United States Government has created civilian conservation camps to provide useful employment; and

Whereas irrigation, drainage and/or improvement districts are in need of roads to aid in their development: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Oregon (the senate jointly concurring therein), That the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon hereby does petition the Congress of the United States to enact into law legislation authorizing the use of the Civilian Conservation Corps in construction of highways within irrigation, draining, and/or improvement districts to aid in their settlement and development; be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of Oregon is hereby directed to send a copy of this memorial to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate, Washington, D. C., a copy to each Representative and Senator from the State of Oregon, also a copy hereof to the speaker of the house and president of the senate of each State legislature in the United States which shall convene during the year 1937.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Washington, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor:

House Joint Memorial 4

To the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States of America; to the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America; and to the Honorable Harry L. Hopkins, Administrator of the Works Progress Administration:

We, your memorialists, the Senate and the House of Representatives of the State of Washington in legislative session assembled, most respectfully petition your honorable bodies as follows:

Whereas the Honorable Harry L. Hopkins, Administrator of the Works Progress Administration, recently promulgated an order discharging many men and women over 65 years of age from Works Progress Administration employment and who are now without any means of support; and

Whereas these aged persons cannot receive a pension from the State of Washington for at least 3 months following their discharge and because of their aged condition find it difficult to obtain any private employment, or even public or private relief; and

Whereas if such a condition continues thousands of our worthy citizens who are now destitute will lose their homes by foreclosure proceedings, and their personal possessions: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That your memorialists respectfully urge the Honorable Harry L. Hopkins to rescind the said order to the effect that no person or persons over 65 years of age shall be dropped from said employment until such a time as their pension application has been approved and an initial payment made thereon; and be it further

Resolved, That those aged persons over the age of 65 years who have previously been dropped from the Works Progress Administration rolls shall be reinstated until they receive their first pension check; and be it further

Resolved, That the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States be urged to pass a sufficient appropriation to continue on with the Works Progress Administration employment; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this memorial be transmitted to the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States; to the Honorable Harry L. Hopkins, Administrator of the Works Progress Administration; and to the United States Senate and House of Representatives of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorials of the Legislature of the State of Washington, which were referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation:

House Joint Memorial 7

To the Honorable the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

We, your memorialists, the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Washington in legislative session assembled, respectfully petition your honorable body as follows:

Whereas, without regard to geographical location, the prosperity of the business and industry of the United States is dependent upon a self-sustaining and prosperous agriculture, the development of which is one of the most vital problems confronting this Nation; and

Whereas this Nation as a whole must depend, at an ever-increasing rate, upon a continued and sound development of its fertile and irrigable arid lands wherever situated for a large part of its present and a much larger part of its future requirements of those crops particularly adapted to irrigable-land production and of which there is no national problem of unexportable surplus; and

Whereas the Pacific West is not now self-supporting in agricultural products required for food, and the rapid increase in population on the Pacific coast, especially in the larger cities, is making it imperative that additional land be made productive for the raising of necessary food products; and

Whereas it has been conclusively demonstrated within recent years that the Federal policy of national reclamation is sound; that it is as vital to the national welfare as flood control and other recognized Federal projects; that the initial financing of reclamation projects by the Federal Government is not a gift of Federal funds to a section of the country but rather a temporary and sound loan certain to be repaid; that the financing of these projects by the arid-land States is impossible because of small taxable values due largely to huge holdings of lands within their borders by the Federal Government; and that the development of these reclamation projects create new wealth and business for every section of the Nation; and

Whereas a failure on the part of the Congress of the United States to continue the national reclamation program and the development of reclamation projects would cause a tremendous financial loss to the Federal Government represented in uncompleted reclamation projects now under construction; would make impossible any balanced solution of the problem of agriculture and proper land use; and would leave this Nation with an imminent shortage of a type of land most adapted to growing specialized crops required by and consumed in every part of the United States: Be it

Resolved, That the Senate and the House of Representatives of the State of Washington in legislative session assembled hereby respectfully petition your honorable body to enact at the earliest possible moment such legislation as may be necessary and proper for the continuance as a permanent Federal policy of the national reclamation program and the development of reclamation projects approved by the Federal Bureau of Reclamation; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this memorial be sent to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to each Member of the United States Senate and House of Representatives from the State of Washington.

House Joint Memorial 8

To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

We, your memorialists, the Senate and the House of Representatives of the State of Washington, in legislative session assembled, most respectfully represent and petition your honorable body as follows:

Whereas recognizing the imperative need for the early development of the Grand Coulee power and reclamation project, we urge our congressional and senatorial delegation in the Congress of the United States to use every effort to secure necessary appropriation for the Grand Coulee project so that the work may be continued without delay. A discontinuance of the present work would result in demoralization of the splendid organization built up by the Federal Reclamation Service, would throw out of employment thousands of our citizens, and would be a distinct discouragement to the orderly development of the Pacific Northwest.

In the past year many people from the drought area of the Central West have come to our State seeking homes. These people are farmers, honest, industrious, and trained in agriculture. We believe that the Columbia Basin lands will be needed by the people of the Nation as soon as they are available. These lands of necessity must be developed slowly, unit by unit, as they are needed for the production of farm products; and

Whereas this great project is of such national importance that any interruption of the work would be regarded in the nature of a tragedy: Therefore

We urge Congress to appropriate sufficient money to finish the present contract and provide funds for a new contract so that the work may continue through the years 1937 and 1938.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a letter from the Oneida County (N. Y.) Bar Association, embodying a resolution adopted by that association protesting against the enactment of legislation to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. NEELY presented a resolution adopted by the Young Democratic Club, of Wood County, W. Va., favoring the enactment of legislation to reorganize the judicial branch of the Government, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LODGE presented 15 memorials, numerously signed, by sundry citizens of the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to reorganize the judicial branch of the Government, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the board of managers of the Society of the Sons of the Revolution in Massachusetts, Boston, Mass., protesting against the enactment of legislation to reorganize the judicial branch of the Government, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GUFFEY presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Whereas the President of the United States has requested the Congress to authorize additional Justices of the Supreme Court in certain instances; and

Whereas the purpose of this request is to provide assistance to the Court and prevent delay and obstruction in the administration of justice; and

Whereas the effect of this proposal will be to hasten those urgently needed governmental and economic reforms demanded by the people which have been obstructed by the political and economic opinions of certain present Supreme Court Justices; and

Whereas the public welfare has suffered almost irreparable harm as a result of decisions denying the protection of labor legislation to the worker abolishing the assistance given farmers and otherwise placing legal technicality above the general welfare; and

Whereas the action proposed by the President would remedy this condition: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved (if the house of representatives concur), That the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania hereby calls upon the Congress of the United States and in particular the representatives of Pennsylvania in the Congress to vote in the affirmative upon this question to the end that justice may be served and the principles of democracy may prevail in the Federal Union; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States and to all Members of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. POPE presented the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Idaho, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

House Joint Memorial 3

A Joint Memorial to the Idaho Congressional Delegation:

Your memorialists, the Legislature of the State of Idaho, respectfully represent that—

Whereas for many years past Bonner County has been a principal center of production for the lumber industry of Idaho until recent years, and now the larger mills have been closed and this region must now rely upon its other resources of farming and recreational facilities; and

Whereas the Legislature of the State of Idaho, realizing the recreational resources of this region, in 1927 enacted a law directing the Governor of this State to appropriate, in trust for the people of the State of Idaho, all the unappropriated water of Pend d'Oreille Lake and declared the preservation of said water for scenic beauty, health, recreation, transportation, and commercial purposes necessary and desirable for all the inhabitants of the State, to be a beneficial use of such water; and

Whereas the War Department of the United States has submitted a comprehensive plan contained in reports published in House Document 103, Seventy-third Congress, first session, which proposed ultimately to store 1,610,000 acre-feet in Lake Pend d'Oreille and regulate it below elevation 2,066.8, United States Coast and Geodetic Survey, by a dam to be constructed at Albany Falls; and

Whereas to maintain the level of the water in Lake Pend d'Oreille at elevation 2,066.8 will submerge and inundate approximately 12,000 acres of cultivable land at the delta of the Clark Fork River and will also submerge and inundate a considerable part of the city of Sandpoint and all of the sewer and water lines of said city; and

Whereas it is the considered belief of your memorialists that to maintain the water of said Lake Pend d'Oreille at a point not in excess of elevation 2,053, United States Coast and Geodetic Survey, will permit the rehabilitation and cultivation of the land aforementioned in the delta of the Clark Fork River and will prevent inundation of any part of the city of Sandpoint or the sewer and water lines thereof: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Board of Engineers of Rivers and Harbors, created under section 3 of the Rivers and Harbors Act of June 13, 1902, be, and is hereby, requested to review the reports submitted in House Document 103, Seventy-third Congress, first session, and any further investigation necessary as aforesaid, with a view to determine the advisability of stabilizing the level of Lake Pend d'Oreille at a point not to exceed elevation 2,053, United States Coast and Geodetic Survey, by channel improvements on Clark Fork River and construction of a dam at Albany Falls at the earliest possible date. This work is in no way to interfere with the development of the proposed Cabinet Gorge project; be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of Idaho send a copy of this memorial to the congressional delegates from the State of Idaho, to be submitted to the Committee on Commerce in the United States Senate and the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, House of Representatives.

Mr. POPE also presented a joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Idaho, favoring the enactment of legislation and necessary appropriations to carry to completion a project to divert the natural flow of water from Yellowstone Lake into the Snake River, which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

Mr. LEWIS presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Illinois, favoring the prompt enactment of legislation to furnish financial assistance to the people of the flood-stricken area of Illinois, who desire to rebuild their homes and business establishments, in the form of loans at a nominal rate of interest, long periods of maturity, and without the necessity of complying with strict security requirements, which was ordered to lie on the table.

(See joint resolution printed in full when laid before the Senate by the Vice President on the 23d instant, p. 1481, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

REORGANIZATION OF THE JUDICIARY

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred a resolution adopted by a mass meeting of citizens of Lauderdale County, Tenn., on February 20, 1937, in reference to the Federal judiciary.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it resolved by the citizens of Lauderdale County, Tenn., in mass meeting assembled on this the 20th day of February, 1937, at the courthouse of said county:

1. We endorse the action of our President, Franklin D. Roosevelt, in submitting to the Congress of the United States his message and plan for the reformation of the Federal judiciary and especially that portion of same designed to "rejuvenate" the Supreme Court of the United States of America.

2. We recognize the fact that the proposed plan is in absolute accord with many previous acts of the Congress wherein the number of Supreme Court Justices has been increased and believe that the welfare of our people demands an interpretation of our laws according to the original intent of the framers of the Constitution and not a narrow, strict, and strained interpretation, such as is being given to it now by those who refuse to see the problems of the day through modern glasses.

3. And we urge our Senators, the Honorable K. D. McKELLAR and Hon. NATHAN L. BACHMAN, and our Congressman JERE COOPER to support the President without hesitancy and wholeheartedly in his plan; be it further Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to our said Senators and Congressman and a copy furnished to the press.

HOUSING FOR LOW-INCOME GROUP

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill known as the United States housing bill of 1937. The object of the bill is to rehouse the low-income group of our country. There is widespread interest in the proposed legislation, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill itself may be printed in the RECORD, and also an explanatory statement following the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill (S. 1685) to provide financial assistance to the States and political subdivisions thereof for the elimination of unsafe and insanitary housing conditions, for the provision of decent, safe, and sanitary dwellings for families of low income, and for the reduction of unemployment and the stimulation of business activity, to create a United States Housing Authority, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A bill to provide financial assistance to the States and political subdivisions thereof for the elimination of unsafe and insanitary housing conditions, for the provision of decent, safe, and sanitary dwellings for families of low income, and for the reduction of unemployment and the stimulation of business activity, to create a United States Housing Authority, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc.,

FINDINGS AND POLICY

SECTION 1. There exist in urban and rural communities throughout the United States slums, blighted areas, or unsafe, insanitary, or overcrowded dwellings, or a combination of these conditions, accompanied and aggravated by an acute shortage of decent, safe, and sanitary dwellings within the financial reach of families of low income.

These conditions are inimical to the general welfare of the Nation by (a) encouraging the spread of disease and lowering the level of health, morale, and vitality of large portions of the American people; (b) increasing the hazards of fires, accidents, and natural calamities; (c) subjecting the moral standards of the young to bad influences; (d) increasing the violation of the criminal laws of the United States and of the several States; (e) impairing industrial and agricultural productive efficiency; (f) lowering the standards of living of large portions of the American people; (g) necessitating a vast and extraordinary expenditure of public funds, Federal, State, and local, for crime prevention, punishment, and correction, fire prevention, public-health service, and relief.

The failure to remedy the acute dwelling shortage has also produced stagnation of business activity in the construction, durable goods, and allied industries, thus impeding business activity throughout the Nation and resulting in widespread, prolonged, and recurring unemployment with its injurious effects upon the general welfare of the Nation.

Private industry alone has been and now is unable to overcome the obstacles in the way of relieving the shortage of decent, safe, and sanitary dwellings for families of low income, or to prevent the widespread, prolonged, and recurring unemployment resulting from the persistence of such obstacles, and the several States and their political subdivisions have been and now are unable adequately to aid in remedying this condition without financial assistance. The legislatures of many of the States have expressly declared the need for assistance along the lines set forth in this act in order to remedy the aforesaid conditions.

It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to promote the general welfare of the Nation by employing its funds and credit, as provided in this act, to assist the several States and their political subdivisions to alleviate present and recurring unemployment and to remedy the unsafe and insanitary housing conditions and the acute shortage of decent, safe, and sanitary dwellings for families of low income that are injurious to the health, safety, and morals of the citizens of the Nation.

One of the three original members shall serve for a term of 1 year, one for a term of 3 years, and one for a term of 5 years, but their successors shall be appointed for terms of 5 years each, except that any individual chosen to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the member whom he shall succeed. The President shall designate one member to serve as chairman and executive officer of the board, in charge of the routine administration of the Authority.

(c) A vacancy in the board shall not impair the right of the remaining members to exercise all the powers of the board, and two members of the board shall at all times constitute a quorum.

(c) The Authority may accept and utilize such voluntary and uncompensated services and with the consent of the agency concerned may utilize such officers, employees, equipment, and information of any agency of the Federal, State, or local governments as it finds helpful in the performance of its duties. In connection with the utilization of such services the Authority may make reasonable payments for necessary traveling and other expenses.

(d) The President may at any time in his discretion transfer to the Authority any right, interest, or title held by any department or agency of the Federal Government in any housing or slum-clearance projects, including all assets, contracts, records, libraries, research materials, and other property held in connection with such projects, and any unexpended balance of funds allocated to such department or agency for such projects; and the Authority may continue any or all activities undertaken in connection with such projects, subject to the provisions of this act.

SEC. 5. (a) The principal office of the Authority shall be in the District of Columbia, but it may establish branch offices or agencies in any State, and it may meet and exercise any of its powers at any place within the United States. (a) The Authority may make such expenditures for the acquisition and maintenance of adequate administrative agencies, offices, vehicles, furnishings, equipment, supplies, and books, for attendance at meetings, for instruction, for traveling expenses, and for such other facilities and services as it may from time to time find necessary for the proper administration of this act. The Authority shall determine and prescribe the manner in which its obligations and expenses shall be incurred, allowed, and paid, and the manner in which accounts shall be audited. Vouchers approved by the Authority for expenditures of its funds shall be final and conclusive upon all officers of the Government; except that all financial transactions of the Authority shall be examined by the General Accounting Office at such times and in such manner as the Comptroller General of the United States may by regulation prescribe. Such examination shall be for the sole purpose of making a report to the Congress and to the Authority of expenditures in violation of law, together with such recommendations thereon as the Comptroller General deems advisable.

(b) The provisions of section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 41, sec. 5) shall apply to all contracts of the Authority for services and to all of its purchases of supplies except when the aggregate amount involved is less than $300.

(c) The use of funds made available for the purposes of this act shall be subject to the provisions of section 2 of title 3 of the Treasury and Post Office Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1934 (47 Stat. 1489), and to make such provisions effective every contract or agreement of any kind pursuant to this act shall contain a provision identical to the one prescribed in section 3 of title 3 of such act.

SEC. 7. (a) The Authority may engage in research, studies, surveys, experimentation, and experimental construction, and may publish and disseminate information pertinent to the various aspects of housing.

(b) In January of each year the Authority shall make an annual report to Congress of its operations, including loans and grants made or contracted for, low-rent-housing and slum-clearance projects undertaken, and the assets and liabilities of the Authority. Such report shall include operating statements of all projects under the jurisdiction of or receiving the assistance of the Authority, including summaries of the incomes of occupants, sizes of families, rentals, and other related information.

SEC. 8. (a) The Authority may from time to time make, amend, and rescind such rules, regulations, and definitions as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

(b) In the exercise of its discretion pursuant to this act and pursuant to the standards, definitions and considerations of policy set forth herein, the findings of the Authority, if reasonably substantiated, shall be conclusive.

ASSISTANCE TO LOCAL LOW-RENT-HOUSING AND SLUM-CLEARANCE PROJECTS

SEC. 9. (a) The Authority may make grants and loans to public-housing agencies to assist the development, acquisition, or administration of low-rent-housing projects by such agencies.

(b) The grant for any such project shall be paid in the form of fixed and uniform annual contributions, over a fixed period not exceeding 60 years. The Authority shall embody the provisions for such grant in a contract of grant guaranteeing such fixed and uniform annual contributions over such fixed period. Such annual contributions as are contracted for shall be strictly limited to the amounts and period necessary, in the determination of the Authority, to assure the low-rent character of the housing project involved: Provided, That the fixed contribution payable annually under any such contract of grant shall not exceed a sum equal to the annual yield at the going Federal rate of interest (at the time such contract of grant is made) plus 1 percent upon the development or acquisition cost of such project.

(c) All payments of annual contributions pursuant to this section shall be made out of any funds available to the Authority when such payments are due, except that its capital and its funds obtained through the issuance of obligations pursuant to section 20 (including repayments or other realizations of the principal of loans made out of such capital and funds) shall not be available for the payment of such annual contributions.

(d) In any one fiscal year the Authority shall not enter into contracts of grant which provide for annual contributions aggregating more than $10,000,000 per year exclusive of any annual contributions payable under contracts of grant made by it in prior fiscal years: Provided, That if the contracts of grant entered into in any one fiscal year provide for annual contributions aggregating less than the authorized $10,000,000, the unutilized balance of such authorization may be carried over as an authorization for any subsequent fiscal year. The faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment of all annual contributions contracted for pursuant to this section, and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated in each fiscal year, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the amounts necessary to provide for such payments.

(e) The loans for any low-rent-housing project pursuant to this section shall bear interest at such rate not less than the going Federal rate at the time the loan is made, be secured in such manner, and be repaid within such period, not exceeding 60 years, as may be deemed advisable by the Authority. The total of such loans outstanding for any such project shall not exceed the development or acquisition cost of such project, less the total amounts outstanding on loans made by third parties, senior to the loans of the Authority, and secured by such project or payable from the revenues thereof.

SEC. 10. The Authority may make loans to limited-profit housing agencies to assist the development or acquisition of low-rent-housing projects: Provided, That not more than $25,000,000 shall be so loaned in any one fiscal year. Such loans shall bear interest at such rate not less than the going Federal rate at the time the loan is made, be secured in such manner, and be repaid within such period, not exceeding 60 years, as may be deemed advisable by the Authority. The total of such loans outstanding for any such project shall not exceed 85 percent of the development or acquisition cost of such project, less the total amounts outstanding on loans made by third parties, senior to the loans of the Authority, and secured by such project or payable from the revenues thereof.

DEMONSTRATION PROJECTS

SEC. 11. (a) The Authority may develop and administer low-rent-housing and slum-clearance-demonstration projects in order to demonstrate to localities the benefits to be derived therefrom. No such projects shall be commenced in any locality without the consent of a governing body having jurisdiction over such locality: Provided, That not more than one demonstration project shall be commenced hereafter in any one locality and that the total estimated development cost of all such projects commenced in any one fiscal year shall not exceed $25,000,000.

(b) As soon as practicable the Authority shall sell its demonstration projects or divest itself of their management through leases.

(c) The Authority may sell a low-rent-housing demonstration project only to a public housing agency. Any such sale shall be for a consideration, in whatever form may be satisfactory to the Authority, equal at least to the amount which the Authority determines to be the fair value of the project for housing purposes, less such allowance for depreciation as the Authority shall fix. Such project shall then become eligible for a grant and loans pursuant to section 9. Any obligation of the purchaser accepted by the Authority as part of the consideration for the sale of such project shall be deemed a loan pursuant to section 9.

(d) The Authority may lease any low-rent-housing demonstration project in whole or in part to a public housing agency or a consumers' housing society: Provided, That the tenant eligibility for a project leased to a consumers' housing society shall not be limited to the members of such society. The lessee of any project, pursuant to this paragraph, shall assume and pay all management, operation, and maintenance costs, together with payments, if any, in lieu of taxes, and shall pay to the Authority such annual sums as the Authority shall determine are consistent with maintaining the low-rent character of such project. The provisions of section 321 of the act of June 30, 1932 (U. S. C., Supp. VIII, title 40, sec. 303 (b)), shall not apply to any lease pursuant to this act.

(e) In the administration of any low-rent-housing demonstration project pending sale or lease, the Authority shall fix the rentals at the amounts necessary to pay all management, operation, and maintenance costs, together with payments, if any, in lieu of taxes, plus such additional amounts as the Authority shall determine are consistent with maintaining the low-rent character of such project.

GENERAL POWERS OF THE AUTHORITY

SEC. 12. (a) In connection with the development or administration of any low-rent-housing or slum-clearance project, the Authority may acquire real or personal property or any interest therein by purchase, eminent domain, gift, devise, lease, or otherwise. In the acquisition of any land or site the provisions of section 355 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, shall not apply, but the Authority may avail itself of the services of the Attorney General acting in accord with his powers under such section to procure information relating to the state of title. The Attorney General shall, upon the application of the Authority, institute condemnation proceedings in its name. The practice and procedure governing such proceedings by the United States shall be followed, and the Authority shall likewise be entitled to proceed in accordance with the provisions of an act of Congress approved February 26, 1931 (46 Stat. 1421), and an act of Congress approved March 1, 1929 (45 Stat. 1415). The Authority may enter into agreements to reimburse any State or political subdivision thereof, or any housing agency, for expenses incurred in the acquisition, by condemnation or otherwise, of property to be conveyed to the Authority for the development of a low-rent-housing or slum-clearance project.

(b) The Authority may foreclose on any property or commence any action to protect or enforce any right conferred upon it by any law, contract, or other agreement. The Authority may bid for and purchase at any foreclosure by any party or at any other sale, or otherwise acquire, and may administer, any low-rent-housing project which it previously owned or in connection with which it has made a loan or grant pursuant to section 9 or a loan pursuant to section 10.

(c) The acquisition by the Authority of any real property pursuant to this act shall not deprive any State or political subdivision thereof of its civil and criminal jurisdiction in and over such property, or impair the civil rights under the State or local law of the inhabitants on such property; and, insofar as any such jurisdiction may have been taken away or any such rights impaired by reason of the acquisition of any property transferred to the Authority pursuant to section 4 (d), such jurisdiction and such rights are hereby fully restored.

(d) The Authority may enter into agreements to pay annual sums in lieu of taxes to any State or political subdivision thereof with respect to any real property owned by the Authority. The amount so paid for any year upon any such property shall not exceed the taxes that would be paid to the State or subdivision, as the case may be, upon such property if it were not exempt from taxation thereby.

(e) The Authority may procure insurance against any loss in connection with its property and other assets (including mortgages), in such amounts, and from such insurers, as it deems desirable.

(f) The Authority may dedicate land for parks, playgrounds, and other recreational facilities, for sewers, for the opening or widening of streets, for incidental improvements, or for any other public purpose, and may grant licenses and easements upon such terms as it deems reasonable.

(g) The Authority may sell or exchange at public or private sale, or lease, any real property (except low-rent-housing projects, the disposition of which is governed elsewhere in this act) or personal property, and sell or exchange any securities or obligations upon such terms as it may fix. To facilitate the sale of such securities or obligations any other securities or obligations retained by the Authority may be subordinated to those sold. The Authority may borrow on the security of any real or personal property owned by it, or on the security of the revenues to be derived therefrom, and may use the proceeds of such loans for the purposes of this act.

SEC. 13. Subject to the specific limitations or standards in this act governing the terms of sales, rentals, leases, loans, contracts of grant, or agreements, the Authority may, whenever it deems it necessary or desirable in the fulfillment of the purpoces of this act, consent to the modification, with respect to rate of interest, time of payment of any installment of principal or interest, security, amount of annual contribution, or any other term, of any contract or agreement of any kind to which the Authority is a party or which has been transferred to it pursuant to this act. Any rule of law contrary to this provision shall be deemed inapplicable.

STANDARDS

SEC. 14. In making any loan or contract of grant for the development, acquisition or administration of a project pursuant to section 9, or any loan for the development or acquisition of a project pursuant to section 10, and in undertaking any demonstration project pursuant to section 11, the Authority shall be guided by these considerations:

(1) In the case of a low-rent-housing project, that there exists in the locality or metropolitan area concerned a shortage of decent, safe, and sanitary dwellings within the financial reach of families of low income, which is not being remedied adequately by private enterprise;

(2) In the case of a slum-clearance project, or a low-rent-housing project which includes slum clearance, that substantially all of the dispossessed inhabitants will be provided for by the development of sufficient low-rent housing, within their financial reach, either upon the site to be cleared or in some other suitable locality, unless the clearance of the area will not make it impracticable for the inhabitants thereof to secure equivalent dwellings elsewhere at no higher cost to them or better dwellings elsewhere within their financial reach;

(3) That the project conforms to a general program formulated by the Authority to distribute the benefits of this act as widely as practicable throughout the United States, consistent with the needs of the several States and their political subdivisions;

(4) That the form of assistance to the project is an appropriate means of carrying out the purposes of this act in the particular case, and that the amount of financial assistance to be afforded such project by the Authority will not be in excess of the amount necessary for such purposes;

(5) That the site on which the project is or shall be developed has been selected primarily for its present and continued suitability for its intended use; that its location and planning are consistent with a logical development of land uses in the locality or metropolitan area concerned; and that it has been or will be acquired for a reasonable price;

(6) The assistance, if any (in the form of partial financing, annual contributions, land in whole or in part, community facilities or services, partial or complete remission of taxes), given to the project by the State or political subdivision in which it is located;

(7) That the advice has been sought, where available, of such planning commission or board (created under charter, statute, or ordinance) as may exist in the locality of the project.

SEC. 15. In order to insure that the low-rent character of housing projects will be preserved, and thus to protect private industry from the competition that would exist either if other than families of low income were accepted as tenants in such projects or if such projects were withdrawn from the financial reach of such families, it is hereby provided that—

(1) When a loan is made pursuant to section 9 or section 10, the Authority may retain the right, in the event of a substantial breach of the covenant (which shall be embodied in the loan agreement) to maintain the low-rent character of the housing project involved or in the event of the acquisition of such project by a third party in any manner including a bona-fide foreclosure under a mortgage or other lien held by a third party, to increase the interest payable thereafter on the balance of said loan then held by the Authority to a rate not in excess of the going Federal rate (at the time of such breach) plus 2 percent per annum or to declare the unpaid principal on said loan due forthwith.

(2) When a contract of grant is made pursuant to section 9, the Authority shall retain the right, in the event of a substantial breach of the covenant (which shall be embodied in such contract of grant) to maintain the low-rent character of the housing project involved, to reduce or terminate the annual contributions payable under such contract of grant. In the event of the acquisition of such project by a third party in any manner including a bona-fide foreclosure under a mortgage or other lien held by a third party, such annual contributions shall terminate.

(3) When a lease of a low-rent-housing project is made pursuant to section 11, the Authority shall retain the right to terminate such lease in the event of a substantial breach of the covenant (which shall be embodied in such lease) to maintain the low-rent character of such housing project.

(4) The Authority may also insert in any contract of loan or grant, lease, mortgage, or any other agreement or instrument made pursuant to this act, such other covenants, conditions, or provisions as it may deem necessary in order to insure the low-rent character of the housing project involved.

SEC. 16. In order to protect labor standards—

(1) The provisions of the act of August 30, 1935, entitled "An act to amend the act approved March 3, 1931, relating to the rate of wages for laborers and mechanics employed by contractors and subcontractors on public buildings" (49 Stat. 1011), and of the act of August 24, 1935, entitled "An act requiring contracts for the construction, alteration, and repair of any public building or public work of the United States to be accompanied by a performance bond protecting the United States and by an additional bond for the protection of persons furnishing material and labor for the construction, alteration, and repair for the said public buildings and public works" (U. S. C., Supp., 1934 edition, title 40, sec. 270 (a) to (d), inclusive), shall apply to contracts in connection with the development or administration of low-rent-housing or slum-clearance demonstration projects and the furnishing of materials and labor for such projects: Provided, That suits shall be brought in the name of the Authority and that the Authority shall itself perform the duties prescribed by section 3 (a) of the act of August 30, 1935, and section 3 of the act of August 24, 1935.

(2) Any contract for a loan, grant, sale, or lease, pursuant to this act shall contain a provision requiring that the wages prevailing in the locality, as determined or adopted (subsequent to a determination under applicable State or local law) by the Authority, shall be paid to all laborers and mechanics employed in the development or administration of the low-rent-housing or slum-clearance project involved; and the Authority may require certification as to compliance with the provisions of this paragraph prior to making any payment under such contract.

(3) The act entitled "An act limiting the hours of daily services of laborers and mechanics employed upon work done for the United States, or for any Territory, or for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes", as amended (37 Stat. 137), shall apply to contracts of the Authority for work in connection with the development and administration of low-rent-housing or slum-clearance demonstration projects.

(4) The benefits of the act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes" (39 Stat. 742), shall extend to officers and employees of the Authority.

(5) The provisions of sections 1 and 2 of the act of June 13, 1934 (U. S. C., title 40, sec. 276 (b) and (c)), shall apply to any low-rent-housing or slum-clearance project financed in whole or in part with funds made available pursuant to this act.

(6) Any contractor engaged on any project financed in whole or in part with funds made available pursuant to this act shall report monthly, and shall cause all subcontractors to report in like manner (within 5 days after the close of each calendar month, on forms to be furnished by the U. S. Department of Labor), as to the number of persons on their respective pay rolls, the aggregate amount of such pay rolls, the total man-hours worked, and itemized expenditures for materials. Any such contractor shall furnish to the Department of Labor the names and addresses of all subcontractors on the work at the earliest date practicable.

FINANCIAL PROVISIONS

SEC. 17. The Authority shall have a capital stock of $1,000,000, which shall be subscribed by the United States and paid by the Secretary of the Treasury out of any available funds. Receipt for such payment shall be issued to the Secretary of the Treasury by the Authority and shall evidence the stock ownership of the United States of America.

SEC. 18. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $51,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, of which $1,000,000 shall be available to pay the subscription to the capital stock of the Authority. Such sum, and all receipts and assets of the Authority, shall be available for the purposes of this act until expended.

SEC. 19. (a) Any funds available under any act of Congress for allocation for housing or slum clearance may, in the discretion of the President, be allocated to the Authority for the purposes of this act.

(b) Any unallocated funds now in the hands of the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works, or hereafter received by it, which are derived from the sale of securities acquired pursuant to title 2 of the National Industrial Recovery Act or the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935, may, in the discretion of the President, be allocated to the Authority for the purposes of this act.

SEC. 20. (a) The Authority is authorized to issue obligations in the form of notes, bonds, or otherwise, which it may sell to obtain funds for the purposes of this act. The Authority may issue such obligations in an amount not to exceed $200,000,000 on or after July 1, 1937, an additional amount not to exceed $250,000,000 on or after July 1, 1938, an additional amount not to exceed $250,000,000 on or after July 1, 1939, and an additional amount not to exceed $300,000,000 on or after July 1, 1940.

Such obligations shall be in such forms and denominations, mature within such periods not exceeding 60 years from date of issue, bear such rates of interest not exceeding 4 percent per annum, be subject to such terms and conditions, and be issued in such manner and sold at such prices as may be prescribed by the Authority, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

(c) Such obligations shall be fully and unconditionally guaranteed upon their face by the United States as to the payment of both interest and principal, and in the event that the Authority shall be unable to make any such payment upon demand when due, payment shall be made to the holder by the Secretary of the Treasury with money hereby authorized to be appropriated for such purpose out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. To the extent of such payment the Secretary of the Treasury shall succeed to all the rights of the holder.

(d) Such obligations shall be lawful investments, and may be accepted as security for all fiduciary, trust, and public funds the investment or deposit of which shall be under the authority or control of the United States or any officer or agency thereof. The Secretary of the Treasury is likewise authorized to purchase any such obligations, and for such purchases he may use as a public-debt transaction the proceeds from the sale of any securities hereafter issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, and the purposes for which securities may be issued under such act, as amended, are extended to include any such purchases. The Secretary of the Treasury may at any time sell any of the obligations acquired by him pursuant to this section, and all redemptions, purchases, and sales by him of such obligations shall be treated as public-debt transactions of the United States.

(e) Such obligations may be marketed for the Authority at its request by the Secretary of the Treasury, utilizing all the facilities of the Treasury Department now authorized by law for the marketing of obligations of the United States.

SEC. 21. (a) Any money of the Authority not otherwise employed may be deposited, subject to check, with the Treasurer of the United States or in any Federal Reserve bank, or may be invested in obligations of the United States or used in the purchase or retirement or redemption of any obligations issued by the Authority.

(c) The Authority may be employed as a financial agent of the Government. When designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and subject to such regulations as he may prescribe, the Authority shall be a depository of public money, except receipts from customs.

SEC. 23. Any person who, with intent to defraud the Authority or to deceive any director, officer, or employee thereof or any officer or employee of the United States, makes any false entry in any book of the Authority or makes any false report or statement to or for the Authority shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned for not more than 1 year, or both.

SEC. 24. SEC. 25. Any person who induces or influences the Authority to purchase or acquire any property or to enter into any contract and willfully fails to disclose any interest, legal or equitable, which he has in such property or in the property to which such contract relates, or any special benefit which he expects to receive as a result of such contract, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned for not more than 1 year, or both.

SEC. 29. This act may be cited as the "United States Housing Act of 1937."

The explanatory statement, submitted by Mr. WAGNER relative to Senate bill 1685, is as follows:

UNITED STATES HOUSING BILL OF 1937—STATEMENT AND EXPLANATION

This bill embodies, in improved form, the major provisions of the housing bill which passed the Senate last year. At that time the measure received tremendous Nation-wide support from all groups interested in housing, including tenants, home owners, builders, workers, concerns financially connected with the construction industry, and the existing agencies of Federal, State, and local governments interested in various aspects of the housing problem. This year, in its present form, the proposal has received even wider general endorsement, particularly from all sectors of the Federal Government that have dealt with this problem.

MAIN PURPOSES

The main purposes of the bill are closely related to the report of the President's Committee on Planning, recently submitted to the Congress. This report stressed the imperative necessity for meeting the unemployment problem on a long-range rather than a temporary basis; for guiding the Federal Government's assistance to business, labor, and the general public along lines dictated by permanent rather than emergency objectives; for measuring each dollar of public moneys spent in terms of its ultimate accomplishments rather than its immediate ameliorative effects; for withdrawing public asistance as private capacity mounts, thus creating a balance wheel to stabilize the industrial activity of the Nation.

The long-range and carefully planned housing program embodied in this measure meets each of these tests to a unique degree. By stimulating the durable-goods industries, now lagging furthest behind in the recovery drive, and by facing the problem of technological unemployment, it will create jobs in private industry for the men and women still idle and dependent upon public relief despite their overwhelming desire to earn a decent living in a normal way. Consequently it will augment and insure the permanence of the remarkable business comeback that we have staged during the past 2½ years. And at a cost much cheaper than the terrible social and business toll of unhealthful housing—in terms of disease, crime, and maladjustment—it will provide better living quarters for millions who now dwell in dismal and insanitary surroundings.

DIFFERENT FROM PRESENT AGENCIES

In 1933 it was imperative to save the home owners from eviction, to repair dwellings that had become delapidated or decayed, and to rescue the investors in real estate from complete ruin. But today the problem before the Nation is positive rather than negative. Instead of saving old homes, new ones must be built. Rather than refinancing old investments, areas must be developed for the operation of new capital.

The undertakings of the R. F. C. and the F. H. A. can do no more than facilitate the financing of homes for people who can afford homes and who have credit standing. This may restore the residential industry to its 1926 status as a luxury trade, but it can never create the solid foundation for permanent economic stability. A foundation must be at the bottom and not at the top. In housing this means provision for the larger market at the bottom of the economic structure who need housing most.

PROVISIONS OF THE BILL

The bill provides for loans and contracts of grant by the Federal Government to assist local authorities in developing low-rent housing and slum-clearance projects for families of low income.

The loans, which may cover the construction cost of a project, will in all cases be fully recoverable by the Federal Government, and will bear at least the going Federal rate of interest. They will thus be sound interest-bearing investments and will cost the taxpayer nothing.

The contracts of grant will provide for subsidies in the form of fixed and uniform annual contributions to housing projects over a period of years. These annual contributions, as determined upon at the outset of any housing project, will be in the amount necessary, and only in the amount necessary, to achieve its availability for families of low income. But in no case will the total annual contributions to any project exceed the carrying costs upon the loan; and, measured in terms of effect upon reducing rentals, in no case will the total subsidy exceed a maximum of approximately 45 percent. Such annual contributions, based upon the remarkably successful English system, will keep Federal appropriations very low, will put the program of necessary public aid on a "pay-as-you-go" basis, and will maintain in the hands of the central authority such control over the continuing aid as will insure the perpetual low-rent character of the projects involved.

The bill therefore embraces a 4-year program by providing $1,000,000,000, to be raised through a bond issue and to be available for sound interest-bearing Federal loans. It also carries an appropriation of $50,000,000 to pay the annual contributions during this 4-year period, at an average of only about $12,500,000 a year. When the housing program is in full swing, every $1,000,000,000 worth of low-rent housing will cost the Federal Government less than $20,000,000 per year, or less than 2 percent. No other undertaking of the Federal Government during the past 4 years holds forth such certain prospects of business stimulation, economy, reemployment, and social advancement.

The following table indicates the scope of the 4-year program as proposed:

Fiscal year	Family dwelling units constructed	Total capital cost (at $4,000 per family unit)	Non-Federal loans (estimated)	Federal loans authorized	Annual contributions through Federal appropriations
1938	50,000	$200,000,000		$200,000,000
1939	75,000	300,000,000	$50,000,000	250,000,000	$6,250,000
1940	100,000	400,000,000	150,000,000	250,000,000	15,625,000
1941	150,000	600,000,000	300,000,000	300,000,000	28,125,000
Total	375,000	1,500,000,000	500,000,000	1,000,000,000	50,000,000

This table shows that the Federal expenditures, in terms of appropriations over the 4-year period, will be only $1 for every $29 of private money drawn into the building program. And when we take account of the likely effect of this low-rent housing program upon housing for other income groups generally, we may say that each dollar of Federal expenditure will evoke $50 worth of private investment in home building.

NO COMPETITION WITH PRIVATE INDUSTRY

It is the inadequate character of the public assistance to date that has made it impractical to rent the present public housing projects except to people of moderate means. This penny-wise pound-foolish policy has brought on the very type of competition with private industry that should be avoided, and, in addition, has carried us directly into a kind of housing that has no just claim on public funds. To reach those who are really entitled to public assistance, and to get into the field where private enterprise really cannot operate profitably is the objective of this bill.

The bill contains other safeguards against competition with private industry. Every housing project that receives a penny of Federal assistance, either loan or grant, will be available only to those families of low income who cannot purchase safe and sanitary quarters elsewhere. If there is competition, it will be only with the miserable conditions of slums and blighted areas.

DECENTRALIZED PROGRAM

All the direction, planning, and management in connection with publicly assisted housing projects are to be vested in local authorities, springing from the initiative of the people in the communities concerned. The Federal Government will merely extend its financial aid through the medium of these agencies. The only exception to the strictly decentralized administration is that the Federal Government may set up a few demonstration projects in order that local areas without adequate instrumentalities of their own may benefit by an experience in low-rent housing. Such projects are limited strictly to one-tenth of the Federal aid. It is provided that these demonstration projects shall be transferred to local agencies as soon as possible. In order to minimize the likelihood of Federal operation even where no local agencies exist, the Housing Authority is authorized to lease its demonstration projects to cooperative nonprofit associations of families of low income who have banded together for the purpose of securing decent housing.

UNITED STATES HOUSING AUTHORITY

The bill contemplates the establishment of a new United States Housing Authority. The encouragement of low-rent housing will be in years to come one of the most significant undertakings of the Government; and to this work should be devoted the single-minded attention and resources of a permanent and independent corporate agency. The establishment of such an agency will not tend to multiplicity. On the contrary, it will enable the President to gather under one roof the scattered organizations now empowered to engage in housing.

CONCLUSION

This is truly a modest beginning. But it is a start in a direction so obviously proper that it has won already an amazingly wide range of support. It combines the business desire for more complete recovery with the humanitarian impulse to provide safer and healthier places in which the people may live.

CONSIDERATION OF THE CALENDAR

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed. Under a special order adopted yesterday the Senate will proceed to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar, and the clerk will state the first bill in order.

RESOLUTION PASSED OVER

The resolution (S. Res. 8) limiting debate on general appropriation bills was announced as first in order.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let the resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

ACCOUNT BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND VERMONT

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 21) directing the Comptroller General to readjust the account between the United States and the State of Vermont was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the joint resolution will be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, I inquire if it is Order of Business 28, Senate Joint Resolution 21, which was just called?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is. Does the Senator desire to have it go over?

Mr. BURKE. I desire to ask, on behalf of the chairman of the Claims Committee, to have the bill, which is a claims bill, referred to the Committee on Claims. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] intended to present that matter here this morning, but he has not as yet arrived on the floor. Meanwhile, I ask that the joint resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

HOLDING OF CIVIL OFFICE BY RETIRED OFFICERS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1116) to amend section 1860 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, to permit retired officers and enlisted men of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps to hold civil office in any Territory of the United States.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with an amendment, on page 1, line 6, after the word "naval", to strike out "or Marine Corps" and insert "Marine Corps, or Coast Guard"; and in line 9, after the word "Navy", to strike out "or the Marine Corps" and insert "Marine Corps, or Coast Guard", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the fourth clause of section 1860 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended is hereby further amended to read as follows:

"Fourth. No person belonging to the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard shall be elected to or hold any civil office or appointment in any Territory, except officers and enlisted men of the Army, the Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard on the retired list."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask that there may be an explanation of the bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, under the Revised Statutes of 1860 no person belonging to the Army or Navy could be elected to or hold any civil office by appointment in any Territory. Later, in 1883, the law was amended by the addition of the following clause:

Except officers of the Army on the retired list.

At that time all Territories were within the continental limits of the United States except Alaska. It was considered that retired Army officers were well fitted for administrative duties in those Territories. We now have within the continental limits no Territories except Alaska. We now have many insular possessions, and it is deemed proper that retired naval officers, as well as Army officers, should be eligible for administrative duties in those insular possessions. The purpose of the bill is to give the same privilege to retired naval officers and enlisted men that is now given under existing law to retired Army officers and enlisted men. Let me add that there are naval officers now acting in administrative capacity in Guam and Samoa that are not incorporated Territories. The Governors of these possessions are officers of the Navy.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. What was the reason for the distinction between Army and naval officers in the original act?

Mr. WALSH. At the time of the enactment of the original law we had no insular possessions. The Territories of the United States were all within the continental limits. It was deemed by reason of the Army being trained for preserving order on land that Army officers should be eligible for appointment to administrative duties in those Territories. Now, with insular possessions, it is felt in many cases desirable to have naval officers appointed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend section 1860 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, to permit retired officers and enlisted men of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard to hold civil office in any Territory of the United States."

TRANSFER OF EXPLOSIVE MATERIALS FROM WAR DEPARTMENT

The bill (S. 1280) to repeal an act of March 3, 1933, entitled "An act to provide for the transfer of powder and other explosive materials from deteriorated and unserviceable ammunition under the control of the War Department to the Department of Agriculture for use in land clearing, drainage, road building, and other agricultural purposes" was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for the transfer of powder and other explosive materials from deteriorated and unserviceable ammunition under the control of the War Department to the Department of Agriculture for use in land clearing, drainage, road building, and other agricultural purposes", approved March 3, 1933, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

REGULATION OF COMMERCE IN FIREARMS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3) to regulate commerce in firearms.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, this is an important bill. Insofar as I have had an opportunity to examine it, the measure seems to be meritorious. However, I should like to have the author of the bill or the chairman of the committee who reported it make an explanation of the manner in which it is proposed to regulate commerce in firearms.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, let me say to my leader that the Senate passed an identical bill at the end of the last session. The bill goes no further than to provide that the shipment of firearms in interstate commerce shall be regulated with a view, so far as possible, to preventing their falling into the hands of criminals or gangsters.

If Senators have read of the murder of a labor leader in New Jersey within 2 or 3 days, they will recall that the number of the gun had been filed off. This bill would endeavor to prevent the shipment in interstate commerce of guns whose numbers have been removed or altered. The bill in no sense interferes with the private possession of firearms by farmers or sportsmen, and has the full approval of the National Rifle Association and the National Pistol Association.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have read the report and, as already stated, am in hearty sympathy with the purposes of the bill. Can the Senator explain briefly how it will prevent firearms from passing into the hands of gangsters?

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator will observe, on page 4, that subsection (d) provides:

(d) It shall be unlawful for any person to ship, transport, or cause to be shipped or transported in interstate or foreign commerce any firearm or ammunition to any person knowing or having reasonable cause to believe that such person is under indictment or has been convicted in any court of the United States, the several States, Territories, possessions (including the Philippine Islands), or the District of Columbia of a crime of violence or is a fugitive from justice.

Then subsection (e) provides:

(e) It shall be unlawful for any person who is under indictment or who has been convicted of a crime of violence or who is a fugitive from justice to ship, transport, or cause to be shipped or transported in interstate or foreign commerce any firearm or ammunition.

On page 5, subsection (h) provides as follows:

(h) It shall be unlawful for any person to receive, conceal, store, barter, sell, or dispose of any firearm or ammunition or to pledge or accept as security for a loan any firearm or ammunition moving in or which is a part of interstate or foreign commerce, and which while so moving or constituting such part has been stolen, knowing, or having reasonable cause to believe the same to have been stolen.

We have had trouble with pawn shops and other institutions in my section of the country, and it is desired to regulate the matter in that regard.

Mr. ROBINSON. What penalty attaches for violation of the provisions of the bill?

Mr. COPELAND. On page 8 will be found the penalty clause, providing a fine of not more than $2,000 or imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or both.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. The bill covers about seven printed pages, and I should like to know a little more about it before being called upon to pass on it. The people in my section of the country are very much interested in the regulation of firearms because of a fear that it may interfere with the possession of firearms by them as sportsmen and for other legitimate uses.

Mr. COPELAND. The bill in its original form was violently opposed by many who might wish, for legitimate purposes, to have firearms in their possession. It received very serious study on the part of the National Rifle Association and the National Pistol Association, and it was with their aid that the bill was finally perfected and now has had removed all the objections which such persons as those mentioned by the Senator from Idaho had to the bill in its original form. The superintendent of my own farm protested vigorously to me about the bill in the first place, but the objections that he and others similarly situated had in mind have been removed. The bill has to do largely and almost exclusively with the shipment of firearms by or to persons with a criminal record. The Senate passed an identical bill last year.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I know that to be so.

Mr. COPELAND. If, after further study of the bill, the Senator feels that it should be given further consideration, I shall be glad to join with him in asking for its reconsideration; but I hope he will let the bill pass, because we want to bring about the control of firearms as far as we can, and this is a long step in that direction.

Mr. BORAH. The bill has been stripped of its objectionable features as presented in the first place?

Mr. COPELAND. It certainly has.

Mr. BORAH. At the present time it is really confined to the question of controlling licensees and licensors in the shipment of arms in interstate commerce?

Mr. COPELAND. That is correct.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The bill is not only stripped of its objections, but those who previously objected are now endorsing it.

Mr. COPELAND. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. That is what was bothering me. I have had letters in the last 2 or 3 days from those who were not certain about it.

Mr. COPELAND. They were, perhaps, thinking of the original bill; but I assure the Senator the objectionable features have been removed.

Mr. BORAH. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

(i) It shall be unlawful for any person to transport, ship, or knowingly receive in interstate or foreign commerce any firearm from which the manufacturer's serial number has been removed, obliterated, or altered, and the possession of any such firearm shall be presumptive evidence that such firearm was transported, shipped, or received, as the case may be, by the possessor in violation of this act.

SEC. 3. RIVER AND HARBOR WORKS FOR FLOOD CONTROL

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1173) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the construction of certain public works on rivers and harbors for flood control, and for other purposes", approved June 22, 1936, which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5 of the act entitled "An act authorizing the construction of certain public works on rivers and harbors for flood control, and for other purposes", approved June 22, 1936, is hereby amended by revising the first paragraph under the heading "Ohio River Basin" to read as follows:

"Reservoir system for the protection of Pittsburgh: Construction of reservoirs for the Allegheny-Monongahela Basin as in comprehensive plan for the protection of Pittsburgh and for the reduction of flood heights in the Ohio Valley generally, as set forth in House Document No. 306, Seventy-fourth Congress, first session, and in the report on the Allegheny-Monongahela Rivers and tributaries on record in the Office of the Chief of Engineers, with such revisions or modifications as may be found advisable by the Chief of Engineers upon further investigation; estimated construction cost, $20,646,000; estimated cost of lands and damages, $34,569,000."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] whether the bill carries an appropriation or an authorization for an appropriation?

Mr. COPELAND. It does not.

Mr. KING. I notice that $34,000,000 may be used.

Mr. COPELAND. The sum mentioned is simply a repetition of the language used in the original act. All this bill proposes to do is to permit the Army engineers to build a dam at a different location than indicated originally. It carries no new money and does not change the effect of the prior act except that it authorizes the Army engineers to use their judgment in relation to the location of the dam.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from New York to say that the bill carries no new authorization, and authorizes no new bridges or any change, except that it authorizes the Army engineers to change the location of a bridge or dam if they please?

Mr. COPELAND. That is correct.

Mr. CLARK. I have no objection to the bill under those circumstances. However, I desire to give notice, in view of the strict limitation of $50,000,000 put on flood-control legislation by the last Congress, and in view of the fact that the Congress actually appropriated no money for flood control, and that allocations were even recommended in certain sections, that, so far as I am concerned, in the future we are going to sink or swim together.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator again, if he will pardon me, if the act which apparently this bill is to amend authorized the construction of works upon the river referred to at a cost of $20,000,000, and the acquisition of lands and the payment of damages at a cost not to exceed $34,500,000?

Mr. COPELAND. To be paid by the State. Let me say to the Senator that bill merely takes out a paragraph of the measure which was passed last year, the flood-control bill, in which was declared a general policy of the division of funds, and so forth. This measure has absolutely nothing to do with the former bill except in the following respect:

The Army engineers at Johnstown, where the great flood occurred a number of years ago, and another one recently, have found on further study that the location of the dam as prescribed in the original bill was at the wrong place, and this bill merely permits the dam to be placed at another location when the money is provided.

Mr. KING. If the money is to be paid by the State, may I ask the Senator what authority there is in the Federal Government to impose limitations upon the State with respect to the amount which is to be paid for land, and the amount which is to be expended for the construction of the reservoir?

Mr. COPELAND. The only restriction is that unless the State does certain things, under the terms of the bill the Army will not proceed with the expenditure of money as authorized.

Mr. KING. I shall not object; but I think the bill needs a little further examination.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill S. 1173 was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PERMANENT INSTRUCTION STAFF AT COAST GUARD ACADEMY

The bill (S. 1441) to authorize the establishment of a permanent instruction staff at the United States Coast Guard Academy was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States is authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint not to exceed five professors to the United States Coast Guard as heads of the departments of instruction at the Coast Guard Academy. An original appointment as professor not made from a civilian instructor or regular commissioned officer in the United States Coast Guard shall be a temporary appointment; but a professor so appointed, after completion of a satisfactory probationary period of 2 years, may be regularly appointed as professor to rank from the date of his original appointment: Provided, That any person who has served as a civilian instructor in the Coast Guard Academy for 15 years or more may be appointed to the office of professor in the Coast Guard Academy pursuant to this section without physical examination.

SEC. 2. A professor in the Coast Guard shall be a commissioned officer with rank not above that of commander and shall receive the pay and allowances of a commissioned officer of the same rank and length of service. When any such professor is commissioned with rank less than that of commander, he shall be promoted through the successive ranks to a rank not above that of commander under such regulations as the President shall prescribe. A professor shall exercise command only in the academic department of the Coast Guard Academy.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to appoint in the Coast Guard, subject to the competitive provisions of the civil-service laws and regulations, not to exceed three civilian instructors, and the compensation of such appointees shall be fixed in accordance with the Classification Act of 1923, as amended.

SEC. 4. Service as a civilian instructor or professor at the Coast Guard Academy or as a commissioned officer in the Coast Guard (regular or temporary), rendered prior to an appointment as a professor pursuant to the provisions of this act, shall be credited in computing the length of service as a professor for purposes of pay and allowance.

SEC. 5. Professors in the Coast Guard shall be on the same footing as to retirement from active service for any cause as other commissioned officers of the Coast Guard: Provided, That service as a civilian instructor or professor at the Coast Guard Academy or as a commissioned officer in the Coast Guard (regular or temporary), rendered prior to an appointment as a professor pursuant to the provisions of this act, shall be credited in computing length of service for retirement purposes: Provided further, That the provisions of law relating to retirement for disability in line of duty shall not apply in the case of a professor until he shall have served 15 years in the Coast Guard.

SEC. 6. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to appoint an advisory committee of the Coast Guard Academy which shall consist of not to exceed five persons of distinction in the field of education who shall serve without pay. The members so appointed shall visit the Coast Guard Academy at least once during the academic year on the call of the chairman and may convene once each year at headquarters at the call of the commandant, for the purpose of examining the course of instruction and advising the Secretary of the Treasury relative thereto. The actual expenses of the members of the committee while engaged in these duties, including their actual expense of travel, shall be defrayed under Government travel regulations from any appropriation available for the authorized work of the United States Coast Guard.

SEC. 7. In addition to the advisory board there shall be appointed in January of each year a Board of Visitors to the Coast Guard, which shall consist of two Senators and three Members of the House of Representatives appointed by the chairmen of the committees of the Senate and the House of Representatives, respectively, having cognizance of legislation pertaining to the Coast Guard Academy. The chairmen of such committees shall be ex-officio members of the Board.

(b) Such Board shall visit the Coast Guard Academy annually on a date to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury. Each member of the Board shall be reimbursed under Government travel regulations for the actual expense incurred by him while engaged upon duties as a member of such Board.

SEC. 8. Nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent the Secretary of the Treasury from assigning any commissioned officer, chief warrant officer, warrant officer, or enlisted man to appropriate instruction duty at the Coast Guard Academy.

SEC. 9. Any appropriation which is now or may hereafter be available for the payment of expenses for the authorized work of the Coast Guard shall be available to carry out the purposes of this act.

SEC. 10. Section 4 of an act entitled "An act to promote the efficiency of the Revenue Cutter Service", approved June 23, 1906 (34 Stat. 453; U. S. C., 1934 ed., title 14, sec. 124), as amended by the act of July 1, 1918 (40 Stat. 640), is hereby repealed, but such repeal shall not be construed to affect existing appointments: Provided, That no appointee, appointed prior to the enactment of this act, may be retained as an instructor in the Coast Guard Academy without appropriate civil-service status for a period longer than 6 months from the effective date of this act.

PURCHASE OF ORDNANCE PROPERTY BY COAST GUARD OFFICERS

The bill (S. 1442) to enable Coast Guard officers to purchase articles of ordnance property for use in the public service in the same manner as such property may be purchased by officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of March 3, 1909 (35 Stat. 732, 751; U. S. C., 1934 ed., title 34, sec. 540), is hereby amended by inserting in line 15 of page 751 of volume 35 of the Statutes at Large of the United States, after the words "Marine Corps", the words "and Coast Guard."

LITTLE ROCK CONFEDERATE CEMETERY, ARK.

The bill (S. 975) to amend the act approved February 7, 1913, so as to remove restrictions as to the use of the Little Rock Confederate Cemetery, and for other purposes, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the act of Congress approved February 7, 1913 (37 Stat. 663), be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to accept a conveyance to the United States of the Confederate cemetery in Little Rock, Ark., which adjoins the national cemetery at that place, and when so accepted the Government shall take care of and properly maintain and preserve the cemetery, its monument or monuments, headstones, and other marks of the graves, its walls, gates, and appurtenances, and preserve and keep a record, as far as reasonably practicable, of the names of those buried therein, with such history of each as can be obtained, and the said conveyance shall be such that it will permit the burial in said cemetery of all soldiers, sailors, or marines and all officers or men of the Coast Guard, dying in the service of the United States, or dying in a destitute condition after having been honorably discharged from the service, or who served, or hereafter shall have served, during any war in which the United States has been, or may hereafter be, engaged, and, with the consent of the Secretary of War, any citizen of the United States who served in the army or navy of any government at war with Germany or Austria during the World War and who died while in such service or after honorable discharge therefrom, as provided in Revised Statutes, 4878, amended by the act of April 15, 1920 (41 Stat. 552; U. S. C., title 24, sec. 281), and the act of June 13, 1935 (Public, No. 132, 74th Cong.), in addition to men who were in the military and naval service of the Confederate States of America: Provided, That the Secretary of War shall at all times leave sufficient space in said cemetery for the purpose of future burials of Confederate veterans: Provided further, That organized bodies of ex-Confederates or individuals shall have free and unrestricted entry to said cemetery for the purposes of burying worthy ex-Confederates, for decorating the graves, and for all other purposes which they have heretofore enjoyed, all under proper and reasonable regulations and restrictions made by the Secretary of War."

ANASTASIA ISLAND LIGHTHOUSE RESERVATION, FLA.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1125) to amend the act entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to dispose of certain portions of Anastasia Island Lighthouse Reservation, Fla., and for other purposes", approved August 27, 1935, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments, in section 2, page 2, line 5, after the word "Florida", to insert "to be used for public park purposes", and at the end of the section to insert "reserving unto the United States of America a perpetual easement for beams of light across any part of said lands that may be between the lighthouse and the sea", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to dispose of certain portions of Anastasia Island Lighthouse Reservation, Fla., and for other purposes", approved August 27, 1935, is amended (1) by inserting immediately after the words "holders of record title thereto" a comma and the following: "their heirs or assigns,"; and (2) by striking out "to Southern Real Estate Corporation, lots 4 to 7, block B, 3 to 7, block C, all of blocks D and E, Seaside Heights;".

SEC. 2. The Secretary of Commerce is authorized to convey by quitclaim deed to the city of St. Augustine, Fla., to be used for public park purposes, that property authorized to be conveyed by such act of August 27, 1935, to such Southern Real Estate Corporation, reserving unto the United States of America a perpetual easement for beams of light across any part of said lands that may be between the lighthouse and the sea.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendments of the committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], who reported the bill, explain it?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, in the absence of the Senator from Florida, I will say that this is a bill which has passed the Senate heretofore. It is the bill of the late Senator Fletcher; and it is put upon its passage now in order that it may go to the House for further consideration.

Mr. McKELLAR. The amendments merely perfect the bill?

Mr. COPELAND. That is all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendments of the committee.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 5) to prevent the adulteration, misbranding, and false advertisement of food, drugs, devices, and cosmetics in interstate, foreign, and other commerce subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, for the purposes of safeguarding the public health, preventing deceit upon the purchasing public, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, this is the so-called food and drug bill. I am about to ask that it go over without prejudice; and my purpose in saying anything is to urge Senators who have any amendments to it to be good enough to have them printed and sent to the committee, in order that they may be given consideration.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have some amendments that I shall offer just as soon as possible—today if I can; and, if not, by tomorrow anyway.

Mr. COPELAND. The committee will be very happy if the amendments may come in at once, because it is hoped that before long the bill may be given consideration. Meantime, I ask that it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

EXTENSION OF NAVAL COMMISSARY PRIVILEGES

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1133) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, and for other purposes", approved March 3, 1909, to extend commissary privileges to widows of officers and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps, and also to officers of the Foreign Service of the United States at foreign stations, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That that part of the act of March 3, 1909 (35 Stat. 768; U. S. C., title 34, sec. 533), which provides "That hereafter such stores as the Secretary of the Navy may designate may be procured and sold to officers and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps, also to civilian employees at naval stations beyond the continental limits of the United States and in Alaska, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe", is hereby amended to read as follows: "That hereafter such stores as the Secretary of the Navy may designate may be procured and sold to officers and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps; to the widows of such officers and enlisted men; to civilian employees of the Navy Department and to officers of the Foreign Service of the United States at naval stations beyond the continental limits of the United States and in Alaska, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the Navy Department maintains commissary stores in those parts of the world where it is not possible for officers and enlisted men readily to buy the necessary supplies which Americans are accustomed to use. There are about 13 of such stores located in the Philippine Islands, China, Hawaii, the Canal Zone, Guam, and elsewhere. Under existing law, the officers and enlisted men of the Navy, the Army, the Marine Corps, and the Naval Reserve, and civilian employees may purchase supplies at these stores. This bill proposes to enlarge the number of persons who may take advantage of the privilege of making purchases at these stores so as to include widows of officers, enlisted men, and civilian employees, and also officers of the Foreign Service.

For illustration, if an officer dies in China, his widow under existing law cannot purchase supplies from commissaries there and it may be impossible for her in the stores of China to get the food that she and her family require. So the bill merely extends to widows of officers and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps, and also to men and their families engaged in the Foreign Service, the privilege of making purchases at these commissaries in countries where it is not feasible or possible for them to get so-called American supplies.

That is the reason for this bill.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, I ask the chairman of the committee if there is any objection to an amendment to include the widows of officers of the Coast Guard.

Mr. WALSH. It is my opinion that they are already included. In fact, since the Senator from Vermont spoke to me about the matter I made inquiry, and I find that the present list of persons to whom these privileges are extended is as follows:

Officers, enlisted men, and nurses of the Navy.
Officers, enlisted men, and nurses of the Marine Corps.
Officers, enlisted men, and nurses of the Army.
Officers, enlisted men, and nurses of the Coast Guard.
Officers of the Public Health Service.
Members of the Naval Reserve on active duty.
Members of the Naval Reserve in a retired-pay status.
Retired emergency officers of the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps.
Officers and crews of vessels of the Lighthouse Service.
Lightkeepers and depot keepers of the Lighthouse Service.
Honorably discharged officers and enlisted men of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard who are being cared for and are receiving medical treatment from the Veterans' Administration.
Wives, children, and other members of the immediate household of officers and enisted men of the Navy.

So while officers, enlisted men, and nurses of the Coast Guard are provided for, it is a fact that their widows and children would not have this privilege. Therefore I see no objection to the Senator's amendment.

Mr. GIBSON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and asked to have stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 7, after the word "Navy", it is proposed to strike out the word "and" and insert a comma; also, in line 7, after the word "Corps", it is proposed to strike out the comma and add the words "and Coast Guard."

On page 2, line 5, after the word "Navy", it is proposed to strike out the word "and" and insert a comma; also, on the same page and line, after the word "Corps", it is proposed to add the words "and Coast Guard."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is provision made for new stores?

Mr. WALSH. None whatever.

Mr. BORAH. The bill applies only to existing stores?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in view of the enlarged category of persons who are to be privileged to purchase supplies from the Navy stores, I desire to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether there will not be increasing demands for appropriations and the building of new stores, and whether there will not be perhaps a million or a million and a half persons who will be buying supplies from commissaries, and the Government will be running all sorts of commercial and business activities?

Mr. WALSH. I will say to the Senator from Utah that if any attempt should be made to provide such stores in communities other than isolated sections and where private individuals could furnish these supplies to Government officials and officers, there would be a tremendous protest. These stores are generally located where there are no American establishments, and it is impossible to get American food, especially meats, and other American supplies. Furthermore, they are self-supporting. They are the cause of no expense whatever to the Government. The cost of these supplies is the exact amount that is necessary to maintain the stores without any additional expense to the Government; and whatever profit is made goes to providing cash registers, wrapping paper, twine, baskets, and the other things necessary for carrying and delivering the food and other supplies.

Mr. KING. This bill, then, would not apply to cases in the interior of the United States where there happen to be widows and children of officers?

Mr. WALSH. I notice in the list I have been given that there are only two or three stations in the United States. There is one at Lakehurst, N. J., and one at Pensacola, Fla., and a few at other naval bases removed from communities that could readily furnish supplies. In all, there are 13.

Mr. KING. There will be more.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill (S. 1133) was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend an act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, and for other purposes', approved March 3, 1909, to extend commissary privileges to widows of officers and enlisted men of the Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard, and also to officers of the Foreign Service of the United States at foreign stations."

REIMBURSEMENT OF MEMBERS OF MARINE CORPS FOR EFFECTS LOST BY FIRE

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1314) to provide for the reimbursement of certain enlisted men and former enlisted men of the Marine Corps for the value of personal effects lost by fire at the Marine Barracks, Quantico, Va., on October 5, 1930, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sum or sums, amounting in the aggregate not to exceed $2,900.04, as may be required by the Secretary of the Navy to reimburse, under such regulations as he may prescribe, enlisted men or former enlisted men of the Marine Corps for the value of personal effects lost as a result of the fire which occurred at the Marine Barracks, Quantico, Va., on October 5, 1930: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claims. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claims, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in view of this bill and the one following it, I desire to ask the Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH] whether he has given further attention to the questions involved, as he raised this issue when a similar bill was under consideration some time ago.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I should like to say to the Senator from Utah that I have examined the reports on both these bills, and both of them show negligence upon the part of the Government.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, in connection with this bill I should like to call attention, especially in this day of agitation for increased wages, to the fact that when a man enlists in the Navy of the United States he is given $21 a month and a bag which provides him with a uniform and other clothing, shoes, and other supplies that cost the Government $100 and 70 cents. Never again, so long as he is in the service, even if it be 30 years, does he get another uniform or other clothing at Government expense. After he is in the service for 4 months he is paid at the rate of $36 a month, and that is the maximum for the average enlisted man in the Navy. Out of this he must purchase future uniforms and other wearing apparel.

To be sure, those who perfect themselves in certain special and technical vocations, and become expert electricians, plumbers, machinists, radio operators, gunners' mates, and others with technical ratings, or who become yeomen or petty officers, have their pay materially increased; but the average salary of the ordinary enlisted man remains at $36 a month. Many of them are high-school graduates, and some of them are even college graduates. The Navy, Army, and Marine Corps never have had better types of enlisted men than at the present time.

In the Marine Corps an enlisted man gets $21 a month and an additional sum of 29 cents a day for the first year and 9 cents a day thereafter which in a year amounts to about $33, and he must buy his own uniform and all other clothing and articles of wearing apparel. Where disaster happens, if it is a "marine disaster", under general law the Navy, without any further legislation, can compensate him for losses of personal effects, but where the disaster happens on land there is no general law covering the case. Therefore, where a fire happens, as in this case and in the next case, through some negligence on the part of the Government, by reason of defective wiring, which is this case, it has been the custom for the Congress to reimburse the men after the Navy makes a report as to the actual loss, and the cause of the fire, and requests legislation in the nature of relief bills like the one now pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill (S. 1314) was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REIMBURSEMENT OF NAVAL PERSONNEL

The bill (S. 1317) to provide for the reimbursement of certain enlisted men and former enlisted men of the Navy for the value of personal effects destroyed in a fire at the naval radio station, Libugon, Guam, on April 15, 1932, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sum or sums, amounting in the aggregate not to exceed $1,486.22, as may be required by the Secretary of the Navy to reimburse, under such regulations as he may prescribe, certain enlisted men and former enlisted men of the Navy for the value of personal effects destroyed as the result of a fire at the United States naval radio station, Libugon, Guam, on April 15, 1932: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claims. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claims, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

STEPHEN SOWINSKI

The bill (S. 510) for the relief of Stephen Sowinski was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Stephen Sowinski, late of Casual Detachment, Second United States Field Artillery, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of that organization on the 4th day of August 1909 for disability of epilepsy (grand mal) incurred in the service in line of duty: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

MICHAEL J. QUINN

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 687) authorizing the Secretary of War to bestow the Silver Star upon Michael J. Quinn, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding the provisions of the act of May 26, 1928, the Secretary of War is authorized to pass upon the recommendations now in the War Department for the award of the Silver Star citation to Michael J. Quinn, late of Battery B, Seventh Regiment United States Field Artillery, and, if such recommendations are found sufficient under the law governing the award of the Silver Star, to award such decoration to Michael J. Quinn.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I notice that the War Department, in the letter from the Secretary, makes this statement:

It is the view of the War Department that, in general, awards of decorations should be confined to cases recommended by the agencies which have been established to administer the general laws providing for awards and that awards by special legislation would be inadvisable and prejudicial to good administration of the general laws.

For the above reasons, the War Department does not favor the proposed bill.

It seems to me there is a good deal of hard common sense in that statement. If there is a board whose duty it is to administer the law relating to such awards, it seems to me we ought to leave such matters to the board, and, as I understand, the board has not recommended this award.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The title of the bill is somewhat misleading. All the bill does is to authorize the Secretary of War to examine further evidence which has been presented, the time allowed by law having passed.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why does the Secretary recommend against it, under those circumstances?

Mr. SHEPPARD. He opposes the policy of reconsideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McKELLAR subsequently said: Mr. President, while the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] is present, I desire to call his attention to Calendar Nos. 94 and 95, being, respectively, Senate bill 510 and Senate bill 687. I ask unanimous consent to return to those two bills for the purpose of asking that the votes by which they were passed be reconsidered, and allowing the bills to go over so that I may look into those two matters. I should like very much that the action by which the bills were passed be considered at this time.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the votes by which Senate bill 510 and Senate bill 687 were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and passed will be reconsidered, and the bills will be passed over.

Mr. McKELLAR. I should like very much that these bills remain on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bills will remain on the calendar.

ROGER P. AMES

The bill (S. 655) to amend an act entitled "An act to recognize the high public service rendered by Maj. Walter Reed and those associated with him in the discovery of the cause and means of transmission of yellow fever", approved February 28, 1929, as amended, by including Roger P. Ames among those honored by said act, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to recognize the high public service rendered by Maj. Walter Reed and those associated with him in the discovery of the cause and means of transmission of yellow fever", approved February 28, 1929, be, and the same is hereby, amended by inserting between the names "Aristides Agramonte" and "John H. Andrus" the name of "Roger P. Ames", so that the act, as amended, will read as follows:

"That in special recognition of the high public service rendered and disabilities contracted in the interest of humanity and science as voluntary subjects for the experimentations during the yellow-fever investigations in Cuba, the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to publish annually in the Army Register a roll of honor on which shall be carried the following names: Walter Reed, James Carroll, Jesse W. Lazear, Aristides Agramonte, Roger P. Ames, John H. Andrus, John R. Bullard, A. W. Covington, William H. Dean, Wallace W. Forbes, Levi E. Folk, Paul Hamann, James F. Hanberry, Warren G. Jernegan, John R. Kissinger, John J. Moran, William Olsen, Charles G. Sonntag, Clyde L. West, Dr. R. P. Cooke, Thomas M. England, James Hildebrand, and Edward Weatherwalks, and to define in appropriate language the part which each of these persons played in the experimentations during the yellow-fever investigations in Cuba; and in further recognition of the high public service so rendered by the persons hereinbefore named, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to cause to be struck for each of said persons a gold medal with suitable emblems, devices, and inscriptions, to be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, and to present the same to each of said persons as shall be living and posthumously to such representatives of each of such persons as shall have died, as shall be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury. For this purpose there is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $5,000; and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such amounts annually as may be necessary in order to pay to the following-named persons during the remainder of their natural lives the sum of $125 per month, and such amount shall be in lieu of any and all pensions authorized by law for the following-named persons: Pvt. Paul Hamann; Pvt. John R. Kissinger; Pvt. William Olsen, Hospital Corps; Pvt. Charles G. Sonntag, Hospital Corps; Pvt. Clyde L. West, Hospital Corps; Pvt. James Hildebrand, Hospital Corps; Pvt. John H. Andrus, Hospital Corps; Mr. John R. Bullard; Dr. Aristides Agramonte; Pvt. A. W. Covington, Twenty-third Battery, Coast Artillery Corps; Pvt. Wallace W. Forbes, Hospital Corps; Pvt. Levi E. Folk, Hospital Corps; Pvt. James F. Hanberry, Hospital Corps; Dr. R. P. Cooke; Pvt. Thomas M. England; Mr. John J. Moran, and the widow of Pvt. Edward Weatherwalks."

SGT. SAMUEL WOODFILL

The bill (S. 300) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Sgt. Samuel Woodfill a captain in the United States Army and then place him on the retired list was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Sgt. Samuel Woodfill, late of the Headquarters Company, Eleventh Regiment United States Infantry, an officer with the rank of captain in the United States Army and then to place him on the retired list in that grade.

PURCHASE AND DISTRIBUTION OF FISHING-INDUSTRY PRODUCTS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1498) to authorize the purchase and distribution of products of the fishing industry, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, or out of funds appropriated for relief purposes, the sum of $2,000,000 for the purpose of enabling the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation to divert surplus fish (including shellfish) and the products thereof from the normal channels of trade and commerce by acquiring them and providing for their distribution through Federal, State, and private relief agencies. No commodities shall be acquired under this act after 90 days after the date of its enactment: Provided, however, That distribution thereof may extend beyond said period. The provisions of law relating to the acquisition of materials or supplies for the United States shall not apply to the acquisition of commodities under this act.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, this bill is one of a series of three which have been presented by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] relating to fish. It seems that the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation have a right to buy agricultural products for distribution for relief purposes, but not the right to distribute fish. The purpose of these bills is to make it possible for them to distribute fish in the same way agricultural products are distributed.

The bill now pending was the subject of a hearing before the Committee on Commerce, and it was decided by the committee that it was a reasonable measure, and ought to be passed.

Mr. McKELLAR. The only purpose of the three bills is to include fish which may be bought, both canned and fresh fish?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; it would include both.

Mr. McKELLAR. It would include both fresh and canned fish?

Mr. COPELAND. So long as they are refrigerated.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, is not this bill identical with Order of Business 103, House bill 4609?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am not able to answer the Senator.

Mr. HAYDEN. Apparently a similar bill passed the House, and if that is the case, we should act on the House bill.

Mr. COPELAND. I ask that the House bill be substituted for the Senate bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4609) to authorize the purchase and distribution of the products of the fishing industry.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from New York whether this bill provides an independent appropriation, or whether the money will come out of the funds heretofore appropriated to the President for various relief purposes?

Mr. COPELAND. As I understand, the suggestion in the latter part of the Senator's question explains how the funds are to be provided.

Mr. KING. The bill does not provide an independent appropriation, does it?

Mr. COPELAND. In any event, it would be an authorization.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, Senate bill 1498 will be indefinitely postponed.

AUTHORIZATION OF PER DIEMS IN AERIAL SURVEYS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1119) to amend section 5 of the act entitled "An act authorizing the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes", approved March 3, 1925, to authorize the payment of a per diem in connection with naval aerial surveys and flight checking of aviation charts, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first paragraph of section 5 of the act entitled "An act authorizing the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes", approved March 3, 1925 (43 Stat. 1190; U. S. C., title 34, sec. 893), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. To cover actual additional expenses to which fliers are subjected when making aerial surveys, hereafter a per diem of $7 in lieu of other travel allowances shall be paid to officers, warrant officers, and enlisted men of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps for the actual time consumed while traveling by air, under competent orders, in connection with naval aerial surveys and flight checking of Hydrographic Office aviation charts and aerial surveys of rivers and harbors or other governmental projects, and a per diem of $6 for the actual time consumed in making such aerial surveys or flight checking of Hydrographic Office aviation charts. The per diem authorized in connection with naval aerial surveys and flight checking of Hydrographic Office aviation charts shall be paid from the appropriation 'Pay, subsistence, and transportation of naval personnel.' The per diem authorized in connection with aerial surveys of rivers and harbors or other governmental projects shall be paid from appropriations available for the particular improvement or project for which the survey is being made: Provided, That not more than one of the per-diem allowances authorized in this section shall be paid for any one day: Provided further, That Naval and Marine Corps personnel shall not be entitled to the allowances authorized by this section when naval tender facilities or the equivalent thereof are available while traveling by air or in the area where the naval survey or flight checking duties are performed."

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, may I ask the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs whether the provisions of this bill should not also apply to the Coast Guard?

Mr. WALSH. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether the Coast Guard makes any aerial surveys?

Mr. GIBSON. It has been so represented to me.

Mr. WALSH. I am not so informed. I may state to the Senate that if the officers of the Aviation Corps of the Army or the Navy are assigned to make aerial surveys under the Department of Commerce of rivers and harbors or other projects, it is provided by law that they shall receive a per diem of $7 and an expense account of $6 a day while actually engaged in making such aerial survey, in lieu of other allowances. These surveys, however, under the law must be other than those pertaining to the naval or military service.

When the Navy undertakes to make an aerial survey its aviators and enlisted men are accompanied by a tender, and on the tender they are given the necessary supplies, so there is no need or occasion for a per-diem travel or expense item. But occasionally it happens—and two such instances have been called to the attention of the committee—that an aerial survey is made at a point or place where a tender cannot accompany the naval officers or enlisted men who are making the survey. Let me add that if it were possible to do so, if it were a matter of national defense, it would be of great advantage if we should have an aerial survey of every part of the world on file. When the Army makes a survey it interchanges the results thereof with the Navy, and when the Navy makes a survey, it interchanges with the Army.

But there are places, as in Alaska and Panama, where it is conceived that at sometime a hostile force might attempt to enter our possessions. It has been deemed wise to make aerial surveys in such remote and distant places. A tender cannot reach some of these places or it would be too expensive to use one for these trips. In these cases, and in other cases, although it rarely happens—I think the total expense is thought to be less than $1,500 a year—it is necessary for the air crew of aerial surveyers to go to a hotel or boarding house and be subjected to abnormal expense.

Under existing law those extra expenses must be borne by the personnel concerned, unless the survey is in connection with a nonnaval or nonmilitary Government project. Specifically, the personnel of the naval aviation detachment who made the aerial survey of the route from Seattle, Wash., to Dutch Harbor, Aleutian Islands, did not receive reimbursement for their necessary expenses incident to that survey, nor did they receive the per-diem allowances authorized by the act of March 3, 1925, because the survey was a naval one. On the other hand, naval aviators who were engaged in conducting an aerial survey in Alaska for the Department of the Interior were compensated for their necessary expenses by receiving the per-diem allowance. In each case the personnel were subjected to additional expense.

The committee feel that the existing law is unfair to service men who are detailed to duty on military and naval projects and believe that the law should be amended to allow them per-diem allowances while on such duty.

Frankly, I do not think there is any occasion for including the Coast Guard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ACCEPTANCE OF MEDALS AND DECORATIONS

The bill (S. 1455) to authorize certain officers of the United States Navy and officers and enlisted men of the Marine Corps to accept such medals, orders, and decorations as have been tendered them by foreign governments in appreciation of services rendered was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Cesaria Del Pilar, mother of Agapito Lomobos, the sum of $250, in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States on account of the death of Agapito Lomobos, which resulted from a gunshot wound caused by a pistol bullet fired by a member of a Marine Corps firing party during target practice at the Naval Station, Olongapo, P. I., on April 25, 1933: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Trotter, former superintendent and special disbursing agent of the Zuni Indian Agency, for payments aggregating $102.40 made to Will Halloran as mileage for the use of his personally owned automobile while performing his official duties as road supervisor in the Indian Service.

SAN CARLOS APACHE INDIANS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1231) authorizing payment to the San Carlos Apache Indians for the lands ceded by them in the agreement of February 25, 1896, ratified by the act of June 10, 1896, and reopening such lands to mineral entry, which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, as payment in full to the San Carlos Apache Indians, at the rate of $1.25 per acre for 232,320 acres of land ceded by them under the agreement of February 25, 1896, ratified by the act of June 10, 1896 (29 Stat. L. 358), less $12,433.63 received by the Indians as royalty under mining permits, the sum of $277,966.37 to be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the San Carlos Apache Indians, and to be available for expenditure for the benefit of such Indians: Provided, That none of the funds herein authorized to be appropriated shall be subject to the payment of any claims, judgments, or demands against the San Carlos Apache Indians accruing prior to the approval of this act.

SEC. 2. The lands referred to in the first section of this act shall be reopened to location and entry under the laws of the United States relating to mineral lands.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add a new section, as follows:

SEC. 2. The lands referred to in the first section of this act are hereby reopened to location and entry under the public land and mineral laws of the United States.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, as introduced and as reported to the Senate by the Committee on Indian Affairs, the lands referred to would be open only to general mineral entry. Since the bill was reported it has been brought to my attention that all existing public-land laws should also apply. The idea I originally had in mind was that this land was ceded primarily for mining purposes; but the Taylor Grazing Act and all other land laws should apply. The effect of my amendment is to accomplish that purpose.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. KING. Is this bill restricted to any particular area, or does it apply to all public land?

Mr. HAYDEN. It refers to the area of land described in the bill, aggregating 232,320 acres, which was excluded from the San Carlos Apache Indian Reservation in 1896 and opened for coal-mining purposes. The Indians were to receive royalties from the coal-mining permits. They have received only a little over $12,000 from that source. Not much of a coal field was developed.

In the meantime, however, mining claims of all kinds have been located, and lands strategically located have passed into private ownership, particularly where water is available. It would now be of no material advantage to have the area restored to the San Carlos Reservation. But the Apache Indians feel that they have a claim to the extent of $1.25 an acre for the lands they lost, and this bill would compensate them to that extent, less the $12,000 they have heretofore received in royalties. A similar bill passed the Senate at the last session of Congress, and was favorably reported to the House of Representatives, but did not pass that body.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator from Arizona whether the case provided for in the bill is the one concerning which there was a great deal of controversy several years ago, and the contention made that the Indians were being robbed by a number of white persons who had located mining claims upon lands belonging to Indians at a time when the title was absolutely in the Indians, and there was no provision covering such matters in the laws of the United States?

Mr. HAYDEN. No, Mr. President; the Senator is referring to some other instance, because the land involved in this bill was ceded by a treaty or agreement ratified by the Congress in 1896.

Mr. KING. I have no objection if the bill in question does not cover the case to which I refer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACHMAN in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MEMORIAL TO THOSE WHO LOST THEIR LIVES ON THE U. S. S. "TULIP"

The bill (S. 1120) authorizing an appropriation for the erection of a memorial to the officers and men of the United States Navy who lost their lives as the result of a boiler explosion that totally destroyed the U. S. S. Tulip near St. Inigoes Bay, Md., on November 11, 1864, and for other purposes, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $2,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy for the erection of a suitable memorial to the officers and men of the United States Navy who lost their lives as the result of a boiler explosion that totally destroyed the U. S. S. Tulip on November 11, 1864, such memorial to be erected on the site of the interment of such officers and men near St. Inigoes Bay, Md., and for the acquisition of the land constituting said site.

LT. COMDR. CHESTER B. PEAKE, UNITED STATES NAVY

The bill (S. 1313) for the relief of Lt. Comdr. Chester B. Peake, Supply Corps, United States Navy, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit the accounts of Lt. Comdr. Chester B. Peake, Supply Corps, United States Navy, with the sum of $39.45, representing payments made by him to the late Commander William F. Gresham, United States Navy, as rental allowance for the period February 15 to March 31, 1935, and disallowed by the Comptroller General as being in excess of the rental allowance to which Commander Gresham was legally entitled.

PHOTOGRAPHING OF MILITARY AND NAVAL DEFENSES

The bill (S. 1485) to prohibit the making of photographs, sketches, or maps of vital military and naval defensive installations and equipment, and for other purposes, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, whenever, in the interests of national defense, the President shall define certain vital military and naval installations or equipment as requiring protection against the general dissemination of information relative thereto, it shall be unlawful to make any photograph, sketch, picture, drawing, map, or graphical representation of such vital military and naval installations or equipment without first obtaining permission of the commanding officer of the military or naval post, camp, or station concerned, or higher authority, and promptly submitting the product obtained to such commanding officer or higher authority for censorship or such other action as he may deem necessary. Any person found guilty of a violation of this section shall be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 2. Any person who uses or permits or procures the use of an aircraft for the purpose of making a photograph, sketch, picture, drawing, map, or graphical representation of vital military or naval installations or equipment, in violation of the preceding section, shall be liable to the penalty therein provided.

SEC. 3. On and after 30 days from the date upon which the President defines any vital military or naval installation or equipment as being within the category contemplated under the first section of this act, it shall be unlawful for any person to reproduce, publish, sell, or give away any photograph, sketch, picture, drawing, map, or graphical representation of the vital military or naval installations or equipment so defined, without first obtaining permission of the commanding officer of the military or naval post, camp, or station concerned, or higher authority, unless such photograph, sketch, picture, drawing, map, or graphical representation has clearly indicated thereon that it has been censored by the proper military or naval authority. Any person found guilty of a violation of this section shall be punished as provided in the first section of this act.

SEC. 4. The term "aircraft" as used in this act means any contrivance known or hereafter invented, used, or designed for navigation or flight in the air. The expression "post, camp, or station" as used in this act shall be interpreted to include naval vessels, military and naval aircraft, and any separate military or naval command.

SEC. 5. The provisions of this act shall extend to all Territories, possessions, and places subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, whether contiguous thereto, or not, and offenses under this act when committed upon or over the high seas or elsewhere within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States and outside the territorial limits thereof shall be punishable hereunder.

JAMES LUKER, SR.

The bill (H. R. 824) for the relief of James Luker, Sr., was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of the current appropriation of the Navy Department for awards of 6 months' gratuity to beneficiaries of deceased enlisted men of the Navy, to James Luker, Sr., father of George De Witt Luker, late an enlisted man in the Navy, who was killed as a result of a powder explosion on board the U. S. S. Trenton on October 22, 1924, the sum of $324, being a gratuity equal to 6 months' pay at the rate received by George De Witt Luker at the time of his death: Provided, That James Luker, Sr., shall first establish to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy that he was actually dependent upon said George De Witt Luker at the time of the latter's death.

CONTROL OF INSECT PESTS OR PLANT DISEASES

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 75) making funds available for the control of incipient or emergency outbreaks of insect pests or plant diseases, including grasshoppers, Mormon crickets, and chinch bugs, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry, solely for the purpose of the RECORD. I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE], the author of the joint resolution, if it is his opinion that the use of the words "grasshoppers, Mormon crickets, and chinch bugs" would in any way deprive the Secretary of Agriculture of the power to use these funds for the control of other pests?

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator, I will say that in the opinion of the Bureau of Entomology and Plant Industry and the Secretary of Agriculture it would not preclude them from going into other fields in connection with migratory insects.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That for the application of such methods of control of incipient or emergency outbreaks of insect pests or plant diseases, including grasshoppers, Mormon crickets, and chinch bugs, as, in the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture, may be necessary, in cooperation with such authorities of the States concerned, organizations or individuals as the Secretary may deem necessary to accomplish such purposes, including the employment of persons and means in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, printing, rent outside of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, the sum of $5,000,000 is hereby authorized to be appropriated, to be made immediately available and remain available until expended; and there are hereby authorized to be appropriated such additional sums as may be necessary to replenish the fund to its original amount at the beginning of each fiscal year: Provided, That such appropriations shall be administered by the Bureau of Entomology and Plant Quarantine and shall be used for expenditures of general administration and supervision, surveys, purchase, transportation, and application of poison baits or materials and equipment for control of insect pests or plant diseases, including grasshoppers, Mormon crickets, and chinch bugs, or for the preparation of such materials for application, and such other expenses as in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture may be deemed necessary: And provided further, That no part of such appropriations shall be used to pay the cost or value of farm animals, farm crops, or other property injured or destroyed.

ERNEST S. FRAZIER

The bill (S. 46) for the relief of Ernest S. Frazier was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Whereas the War Department has itself eliminated from the discharge certificate of Ernest S. Frazier, late of the Texas National Guard in Federal service, the words "illiterate and degenerate": Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That the War Department is hereby authorized and directed to eliminate the words "illiterate and degenerate" from the record of said Ernest S. Frazier wherever the said words occur in such records.

SEC. 2. That the Veterans' Administration is also hereby authorized and directed to eliminate the words "illiterate and degenerate" from the record of Ernest S. Frazier wherever said words occur in such records.

The preamble was agreed to.

NATIONAL GALLERY OF ART

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 73) providing for the construction and maintenance of a National Gallery of Art was announced as next in order.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, in the absence of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], I am requested on behalf of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to ask that the bill be passed over; and I ask that it go over.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I will say for the benefit of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] that the joint resolution is for the purpose of carrying out the wishes of Mr. Mellon in the matter of presenting an art gallery to the Government.

Mr. McNARY. Yes; I understand that to be the purpose. However, I have been requested to ask that the joint resolution be passed over, and I ask that that be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over.

STATE OF MASSACHUSETTS

The bill (S. 761) for the relief of the State of Massachusetts was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I observe that this bill does not authorize an appropriation, but it specifically appropriates money. I desire to call the attention of the author of the bill to the fact that the bill will have to go to the Appropriations Committee first, and I think it would be advisable if he would ask unanimous consent to let the bill be referred to that committee.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE] has objected to the bill, and I assume it will go over; and I will give attention to the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee in the meantime.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, my objection today was on the basis that the Committee on Claims, at its meeting, decided to ask that these bills, which are strictly of a claims nature, should be referred to the Committee on Claims. This bill came before the Committee on the Judiciary, and should properly have come before the Committee on Claims. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] at an early opportunity will ask to have bills of this nature referred to the Committee on Claims for study.

Mr. McKELLAR. At all events, Mr. President, the bill must go to the Committee on Appropriations, because it is against the rules to appropriate money directly, as proposed in the bill.

Mr. WALSH. A similar bill has on four previous occasions been passed by the Senate. The opposition seems to be due to the age of the claim rather than its merit.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not criticizing the bill.

Mr. WALSH. I am not in opposition to the Senator's suggestion. I think the request of the Senator from Nebraska is in order, and that the bill may go over to be given more consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

JOINT RESOLUTION PASSED OVER

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 51) to amend the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution providing for the prohibition of the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent countries; the prohibition of the transportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war by vessels of the United States for the use of belligerent states; for the registration and licensing of persons engaged in the business of manufacturing, exporting, or importing arms, ammunition, or implements of war; and restricting travel by American citizens on belligerent ships during war", approved August 31, 1935, being Public Resolution No. 67, Seventy-fourth Congress (S. J. Res. 173), as amended by joint resolution approved February 29, 1936, entitled "Joint resolution extending and amending the joint resolution (Public Res. 67, 74th Cong.), approved August 31, 1935", was announced as next in order.

Mr. McNARY. I ask that the joint resolution be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over.

EDWARD N. JERRY

The bill (S. 44) for the relief of Edward N. Jerry was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that the bill be passed over.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, may I make an explanation of the bill?

Mr. KING. Let me call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to the fact that the letter from Major General Conley, contained in the report of the committee, seems to discredit this bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Not in view of what the Veterans' Administration reports regarding this measure.

This soldier, through no fault of his own, failed to make application within the legal time limit for benefits under the Emergency Officers' Retirement Act. He was not to blame for not knowing when the time limit expired. It is beyond the question that his injury occurred in line of duty; and all the bill asks is that he be allowed to present his claim at this time to the Veterans' Administration for consideration on its merits.

Mr. KING. My recollection of the testimony and report indicates that there was no injury of any consequence.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I will say to the Senator that we have found, from evidence presented to us, that this soldier received a permanent injury in line of duty while serving in France by being thrown violently against a tree from a horse he was riding, which became frightened at the explosion of a shell. Be that as it may, all the evidence will be considered, if this bill becomes law, in connection with the soldier's application to the Veterans' Administration for benefits under 1928 Emergency Officers' Retirement Act.

Mr. KING. I might add, supplementing what I said, that General Conley in his letter says:

> At present no evidence of soreness or tenderness of knee and no oedema. The examining surgeon further stated that in view of his occupation this officer was no percent disabled.

Mr. SHEPPARD. General Conley is referring to the soldier's condition at the time of his discharge in 1919. Evidently the injury became active again, because General Hines, of the Veterans' Administration, states in his report on the case that this veteran has a service-connected disability and that he is currently rated as disabled to a degree of permanent partial 63 percent.

Mr. KING. I think the Government probably will suffer an injustice, but I withdraw the objection.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 44) for the relief of Edward N. Jerry was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is authorized and directed to extend the benefits of the act entitled "An act making eligible for retirement, under certain conditions, officers and former officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps of the United States, other than officers of the Regular Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, who incurred physical disability in line of duty while in the service of the United States during the World War", approved May 24, 1928, to Edward N. Jerry, who was appointed as captain, Coast Artillery Officers' Reserve Corps, November 27, 1917, and who was assigned to active duty the same date. The application of the said Edward N. Jerry for the benefits of such act of May 24, 1928, shall be filed with the Veterans' Administration within 6 months from the date of the approval of this act.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 294) for the relief of Elmer Blair was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, according to my recollection, a bill similar to the one now before us was vetoed by the President.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, that bill may go over for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

RETIREMENT OF JUSTICES OF THE SUPREME COURT

The bill (H. R. 2518) to provide for retirement of Justices of the Supreme Court was announced as next in order.

Mr. McNARY. I ask that the bill be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

All accounts and vouchers covering expenditures shall be approved by the said Commissioner General, or by such assistants as he may designate, except for such allotments as may be made to the various executive departments, independent offices, and establishments for direct expenditure; but these provisions shall not be construed to waive the submission of accounts and vouchers to the General Accounting Office for audit, or permit any obligations to be incurred in excess of the amount authorized herein: And provided further, That in the construction of exhibits requiring skilled and unskilled labor, the prevailing rate of wages, as provided in the act of March 3, 1931, shall be paid.

SEC. 7. The Commissioner General, with the approval of the Commission, may receive contributions from any source to aid in carrying out the purposes of this joint resolution, but such contributions shall be expended and accounted for in the same manner as the funds made available by this joint resolution. At the close of the exposition or when the connection of the Government of the United States therewith ceases, the Commissioner General shall dispose of any such portion of the material contributed as may be unused, and return such borrowed property: Provided, That all disposition of such materials and property shall be at public sale to the highest bidder, and the proceeds thereof shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

This section shall take effect on the date of the submission to the Congress of the final report of the United States Texas Centennial Commission as provided by section 9 of Public Resolution No. 37, Seventy-fourth Congress, approved June 28, 1935.

SEC. 9. All funds allocated by the United States Texas Centennial Commission to the Commission of Control for Texas Centennial Celebrations under the provisions of such Public Resolution No. 69 shall be transferred, on the date of enactment of this joint resolution, to said Commission of Control for Texas Centennial Celebrations to carry out the purposes for which such funds were so allocated.

SEC. 10. It shall be the duty of the Commission to transmit to Congress, within 6 months after the close of the exposition, a detailed statement of all expenditures, and such other reports as may be deemed proper, which reports shall be prepared and arranged with a view to concise statement and convenient reference. Upon the transmission of such report to Congress the Commission established by and all appointments made under the authority of this joint resolution shall terminate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That completes the calendar.

EXTENSION OF AUTHORITY TO NEGOTIATE TRADE AGREEMENTS

The Senate resumed consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 96) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG].

Mr. AUSTIN obtained the floor.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield to me?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the Senator from Nevada for a question.

Mr. McCARRAN. Will the Senator yield for a motion to take up a House bill which has just been passed over?

Mr. AUSTIN. Is it a motion to recur to something on the calendar that was passed over?

Mr. McCARRAN. Yes. It refers to Calendar No. 119, House bill 2518.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I objected to the consideration of that bill when it was called on the calendar.

Mr. McCARRAN. I desire to move that the bill be taken up now.

Mr. McNARY. A motion of that kind would not be in order. The Senate is working under a unanimous-consent agreement, and upon the objection of one Senator a bill goes over, and that settles the status of the bill for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the Senate has completed the consideration of bills on the calendar. The Senator from Vermont has the floor.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, the pending question relates to means of government concerning production, manufacturing, commerce, and other economic functions. Moreover, the pending joint resolution, if effective, would extend to 1940 Executive power to legislate and to make treaties. Although the subject matter is tariff, excises, and import restrictions, schedules, definitions, and classifications, the most significant import of the resolution is its character as one of the measures centralizing governmental functions in the Executive.

Shall we restore the republican form of government or shall we continue the temporary reversion to autocracy suffered under the stress and pressure of emergency?

Considering the economic aspect of the question, protective tariffs have been beneficial. We have observed the direct effect of them in raising the value of our farms and the standard of living of our people.

We have noticed that, as a sequel, our neighbors from across the boundary have immigrated and settled in our country in such numbers that we had to build up against immigration powerful walls and barriers. Now almost everybody is in favor of the protective tariff.

Of course, we must recognize that there are some who believe in what they call a competitive tariff, but the essential principle of protection is contained even in the competitive tariff.

We have had depressions from time to time and, with the rest of our neighbors, have suffered, but, speaking relatively, our progress has outrun that of our neighbors, and this is undoubtedly due to the protection from competition abroad currently with the free competition among the several States. We have kept the standard of living high by coordinating our foreign and domestic economies. We have kept our factories operating and our farms and mines producing by preventing foreign cheap labor from preempting their market. We have kept the price to the consumer within the four corners of the pay envelope by our domestic competitive system; so that the quantity of goods and the measure of other purchasable satisfactions that our people on the average could buy with their income has been high. Obviously, the lower prices produced by competition has given us a higher real income or, to state it in another way, a higher standard of living. Now we are setting out to reverse the policy. By regimentation among the several States we set about to increase costs of production, and by lowering duties and modifying import restrictions we set about to increase competition.

Under the protective system the wages of our workmen have exceeded those of other nations, and hours and conditions of service have improved. Nevertheless, we aim at still better conditions and higher standards of living, as well as regularization of employment. These objectives are not monopolized by any party or faction. They animate all who oppose, as well as all who support, the pending joint resolution. The point of departure is as to the means of attaining the end.

The lowering of duties on competitive commodities below the cost of production at home, and the removal of import restriction and defensive measures, is in conflict with the economy claimed by the New Deal and expressed in the N. I. R. A., the A. A. A., and the 30-hour bill.

The collision of economic principles between the Tariff Act of 1934, which is the act sought to be extended by the pending joint resolution, as interpreted by those who claimed to know most about it in the hearings before the Committee on Finance, and New Deal legislation regimenting interstate commerce is apparent when one examines section 3 (e) of the N. I. R. A. Act.

Let me call attention to that section, because it shows the concern which labor has, which working people have, that the higher cost of production of goods here at home should not throw them out of employment by virtue of the tremendous advantage possessed by foreign goods and commodities brought to our shores and produced under conditions not requiring the shortening of hours and the increasing of wages. I read section (e) because I think it is one of the most eloquent proofs of the collision of systems, the collision of economic plans and schemes, and shows that none of them have been thought out to the end so that they would be pulling together instead of pulling apart. Section 3 (e) reads:

On his own motion, or if any labor organization, or any trade or industrial organization, association, or group, which has complied with the provisions of this title, shall make complaint to the President that any article or articles are being imported into the United States in substantial quantities or increasing ratio to domestic production of any competitive article or articles on such terms or under such conditions as to render ineffective or seriously to endanger the maintenance of any code or agreement under this title, the President may cause an immediate investigation to be made by the United States Tariff Commission, which shall give precedence to investigations under this subsection, and if, after such investigation and such public notice and hearing as he shall specify, the President shall find the existence of such facts, he shall, in order to effectuate the policy of this title, direct that the article or articles concerned shall be permitted entry into the United States only upon such terms and conditions and subject to the payment of such fees and such limitations in the total quantity which may be imported (in the course of any specified period or periods) as he shall find it necessary to prescribe in order that the entry thereof shall not render or tend to render ineffective any code or agreement made under this title.

In addition, in furtherance of the section, he had power to forbid entirely the importation of any articles. Thus—

In order to enforce any limitations against the total quantity of imports, in any specified period or periods, of any article under this subsection, the President may forbid the importation of such article or articles unless the importer shall have first obtained from the Secretary of the Treasury a license pursuant to such regulations as the President may prescribe. Upon information of any action by the President under this subsection the Secretary of the Treasury shall, through the proper officers, permit entry of the article or articles specified only upon such terms and conditions and subject to such fees, to such limitations in the quantity which may be imported, and to such requirements of license, as the President shall have directed. The decision of the President as to facts shall be conclusive. Any condition or limitation of entry under this subsection shall continue in effect until the President shall find and inform the Secretary of the Treasury that the conditions which led to the imposition of such condition or limitation upon entry no longer exists.

The collision of economic principles between the Tariff Act of 1934, as interpreted, and New Deal legislation, regimenting interstate commerce, is apparent when considering section 15 (e) of the A. A. A., providing for a compensating tax on any article processed or manufactured wholly or in chief value from a basic commodity and imported into the United States, the compensating tax to equal the amount of the processing tax in effect with respect to domestic processing at the time of importation.

And this requirement is attached to that enactment.

Such tax shall be paid prior to the release of the article from customs custody or control.

The collision of economic principles between the Tariff Act of 1934, as interpreted, and New Deal legislation, regimenting interstate commerce, is also apparent when considering the 30-hour bill, S. 158, in the Seventy-third Congress, first session, page 10, section 8 of the Connery amendment; also found on page 3 of the report of the Committee on Labor of the House of Representatives, dated May 10, 1933.

Its omission from the pending Federal licensing bill, H. R. 2881, Seventy-fifth Congress, first session, calendar day January 13, 1937, introduced in the House of Representatives by Mr. CONNERY, is a recognition of the collision.

It was provided that while the proposed 30-hour act continued in force the Secretary of the Treasury should—

Prohibit the entry of foreign-made goods, which goods are similar or comparable to goods produced in the United States of America, if such foreign-made goods are entered at total landed costs which are less than American cost of production of similar or comparable American-made goods.

It is very interesting to observe what William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, had to say about that attempt to preserve the protective principles of the United States in order to save American labor at a time when its condition was being bettered, if possible, by legislation which was obviously in direct conflict with the Tariff Act of 1934.

What the president of the American Federation of Labor said appears at page 65 of the hearings before the Committee on Labor of the House of Representatives, Seventy-third Congress, first session. I read as follows:

I am directed by the executive council to say to you, Mr. Chairman, and to the committee, that we are in favor of this part of the bill, the 6-hour day and the 5-day workweek applying to goods manufactured abroad and shipped here and sold in the United States in competition with goods manufactured at home.

Mr. WELCH. Will you repeat that, Mr. Green, so the committee will be sure to get it? It is a matter in which we are all vitally concerned.

Mr. GREEN. I thought you were. I am directed by the executive council to say to this committee that we favor the clause in the Connery bill—perhaps I should put it that way—which makes applicable the restrictions of the 6-hour day and the 5-day week to goods manufactured abroad, shipped to the United States, and sold here in interstate commerce.

In passing, let me ask what, as a practical matter, may Congress do with respect to the hundreds of items of goods or commodities which already have been tied up for 3 years and 6 months by treaties with 15 different countries which have the effect of making changes in tariff regulations and restrictions, lowering tariff duties and providing other conditions which affect our international commerce? Under such circumstances what can Congress do with reference to the improvement of the conditions of labor?

What can Congress do with reference to the improvement of the condition of labor that is engaged in the manufacture of any of these articles? Certainly if Congress is undertaking to carry out the protection to the extent expressed in the Connery bill, it will cover not only the same goods but it will cover similar goods also. The language is:

Which goods are similar or comparable to goods produced in the United States of America.

That broadens the scope of the act to the point where he who runs may read the collision between these two principles, the principle of free trade as represented by the application of the Tariff Act of 1934 in the 15 treaties already made, and the principle of regimented trade among the several States, a complete upheaval and overturning of the principles under which American women and American men have developed to be the smartest women and the most capable men in all the world.

Again the question occurs to one studying the situation, When will the President request of us the power to open the doors to unrestricted immigration as an element of bargaining? He might as well, of course, let the immigrant in and have him do his work here as to leave him outside the door and permit his work to come in. In fact, from an economic point of view, probably it would be better for the working people of this country if he were brought in and his service put on the same plane of competition with the service of the workmen already here.

When will Japan ask the United States to raise the barriers to her nationals, to admit them freely to the United States, as a consideration for the commercial advantages to the raisers of cotton in the United States? When the demand is made, why not expect to find the President of the United States sending to Congress a message, with a bill all drafted by him, granting to him that extraordinary power of legislating the policy, describing the schedules, formulating the restrictions, and thereupon himself ratifying the treaty?

A recent expression of the danger of foreign competition to labor is that of Matthew Woll, president of America's Wage Earners' Protective Conference. Let me say in passing that I regard him as an authority well worth while giving weight to on any matter that affects American workmen. In a radio address which he delivered February 4 this year he concluded as follows:

Against the background of this brief survey it seems imperative that American labor and American industry receive legislative answer to these questions:

1. Ordinary import duties are no defense against an invasion of the American market by aggressive foreign industries. What protection does our Government propose to make to protect our market from the invasion of these foreign-made goods subsidized by foreign governments?

Subsidized in many and various ways, not only for entry into this country but we find them subsidizing their goods for entry into other countries where we are natural competitors with them. So it is that not only does labor make an outcry at this intolerable situation which is permitted to go on in spite of the power given by us to the President to make these treaties, but also we find that the exporters, as represented in the national foreign trade convention of the National Foreign Trade Council, Inc., and the National Foreign Trade Association, recently held at Chicago, passed this broad resolution which constitutes not merely a request for something to be done but constitutes evidence of the condition which we complain exists:

We call attention to the fact that the reciprocal principle is vitiated when a country having a trade agreement with the United States permits uncontrolled entry from a third country of goods which have been subsidized in any form to a degree prejudicial to our ability to compete. We believe suitable steps should be taken to remedy this situation.

Here are employees and here are distributors speaking. We have the workmen, the employer, and the distributor all agreeing on the proposition that the protective principle must be preserved in order to save our workmen from being driven out of their employment ultimately by the competition of goods made abroad under conditions of service and under laws with respect to hours and wages with which we cannot possibly compete.

Again Mr. Woll said:

2. Barter deals by American and foreign firms result in acceptance in payment by such firms of articles of other and unrelated industries dumped on the American market without regard to effect on prices, wages, and employment. What protection may we expect against the dumping of foreign-made goods?

3. American sales in foreign markets are being destroyed by the discriminatory treatment of foreign governments, including the governments of the British Empire. What action, if any, is contemplated to secure the removal of Empire preferences and the resultant discriminations which are flourishing in various parts of the world?

Is there under consideration an adequate program of action to meet these dangerous problems, dangerous alike to labor, farm, and industry?

Mr. President, I invite attention to the fact that the Tariff Act of 1934 will be in effect for 3 years and 6 months after the effective date of the last tariff treaty which may be made under it. Nothing that we can do, legally or morally right, can stop that. The autocratic power granted to the President will continue until June 12, 1940, if House Joint Resolution 96 should become a law and should not go to the Supreme Court and be declared void.

There are those who are especially interested in international trade. We have observed that during the depression some of our manufacturers depended upon foreign markets to keep them alive. Although our foreign trade is historically less than 10 percent of our whole trade, nevertheless it is so specialized that it is important to our welfare that it be encouraged. Moreover, as consumers of some goods mainly produced abroad, it is for our benefit to reduce the price by reducing the rate of duty or by putting such articles on the free list. There seems no room for debate over the proposition that if rates are too high or too low they come in conflict with our free economy at home and all of its beneficial objectives. The means of regulation of these rates of duty, therefore, should be scientific and flexible and capable of adaptability to emergencies and changing conditions.

In passing let me call attention again to what was so eloquently spoken of yesterday by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], contrasting the flexible, scientific, and capable manner of adapting rates to conditions and costs of production with this unconstitutional method of fiat by the Executive, proclaiming duties, proclaiming laws, proclaiming treaties without ratification. Six times in the year 1936 the Tariff Commission reported to the President that rates ought to be changed, and six times during that one year the President proclaimed the change of those rates; and five times out of the six he had to raise the rates, not lower them. The protective principle as an oaken beam supporting the economy of this country was recognized and saved by this scientific method of handling tariff rates. On the other hand, 100 percent of all the changes of rates made under this fixed and arbitrary plan of Presidential proclamation was to lower the duties.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. I interrupt the Senator from Vermont to ask him his legal opinion, recognizing him both as an able lawyer and as a student of constitutional government. Does he recall the exact distinctions which the Supreme Court of the United States made in Field against Clark as sustaining the provision of reciprocity and tariff reduction by commission, as then advanced under a tariff act which we speak of as the McKinley Act? Does my able friend from Vermont accept that decision as establishing a basis for the right of government to transfer these questions of tariff taxes to a President or to a commission instead of to Congress?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I cannot claim such lucid and sound memory of cases as I accord to the distinguished and able Senator from Illinois. I have come to respect with awe his memory regarding cases; but I should say that my present recollection is—though I have not recently studied that case—that it turned upon this feature of the statute; namely, the establishment of a standard which should guide the Commission and the President in the performance of what is in effect a ministerial function, acting as the hand of the Congress of the United States, as it were, and that that standard and guide was the very principle for which I am arguing today, namely, the difference between the cost of production of goods here in America and the cost of production abroad. The act provided that between certain fixed limits—namely, 50 percent above and 50 percent below the existing amounts of duty—this scientific, nonpolitical Commission, actuated by the citizen or actuated by the Chief Executive or actuated by the Congress, could make an investigation in which that rule was employed, a rule of the Congress; and my recollection is that that was the essential thing that supported as constitutional that apparent delegation of power.

Does that answer the Senator's question?

Mr. LEWIS. I am quite sure the Senator is right as to that feature of the act. I did not mean to assume that I have a superior knowledge or memory to any other Senator touching their citations of the Supreme Court of the United States generally. I inform the Senator that my memory as to this particular case is impressed all the more as it arose in my city. It was a suit brought by Marshall Field's establishment, the great dry-goods house of Chicago, against the collector of customs, whose name at that time was Clark. It is my recollection that when that case reached the Supreme Court of the United States, the Court held that it was within the power of Congress to transmit to the President, or to such body as he might name, the power to suggest rates as equitable, and that when adopted by the President they afterward became the law of the land.

I may be slightly in error, and the Senator may be right in his statement.

Mr. AUSTIN. I do not recall that feature of the case. Undoubtedly the Senator from Illinois is correct.

Mr. LEWIS. I may be wrong in part of it, but that is my memory only, and I felt this:

I say now that I do not agree with the decision. I beg pardon of the Senator for saying that I belong to the class of Democrats who believe that tariffs are essential to this country and the just protection of our produce to the full extent as against other countries that levy similar burdens against us to protect themselves and place embarrassment against our produce. I felt that that decision opened the gates to taking away from Congress the privilege of creating the rates of tariffs and framing a tariff bill, and transmitting it to executive bodies—a power that was never intended by the Constitution to be thus vested.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Illinois for his remarks. I have much respect for the position he takes; but I admit that my own view is that the delegation contained in the Tariff Act of 1930 of power to operate by means of a commission is a proper delegation of power, because it delegates a minor function, a function that is not of that primary importance which must be held to be legislation under our Constitution.

However, that takes me far afield from the thought I had in mind; and I now return to the proposition that the means of regulating these rates of duty should be scientific and flexible and capable of adaptability to emergencies and changing conditions. These means should not, however, be a device capable of arbitrarily destroying or injuring one activity for the benefit of another activity. Viewing the long-time welfare as well as the immediate promotion of business, we Americans must have the right to be heard in the levying of taxes which we pay. The Tariff Act of 1934 deprives us of this right, and is, therefore, not beneficial from the long-time point of view. With respect to immediate promotion of business, even here it cannot be determined with certainty that the exercise of arbitrary power in making the 15 treaties already in effect is the cause of increased business, or is of net financial benefit, or is fair to all activities. The length of time during which any treaty has been in effect is too short to afford decisive evidence. I suppose a good test of the effectiveness of this evidence would be to turn to the Belgian treaty, because the Belgian treaty went into effect on May 1, 1935, and therefore is one of the two oldest treaties in point of effectiveness.

Since under the Belgian treaty none of the import duties may be reduced during the life of the treaty, and since they are all extended to all other nations having most-favored-nation relations with us, and since the imports from Belgium of the commodities on which duties have been reduced have increased in quantity and value during the first 12 months of the treaty 111 percent, against an increase of exports granted concessions by Belgium of 10 percent, is it not reasonable to conclude that economic benefits to us have not been established by our experience under the Belgian treaty?

That is one of the most favorable treaties that could be considered from length of operation, as I view it; and yet it is obvious that if the benefits to Belgium by way of a gain or increase have equaled 111 percent, whereas our exports to Belgium have gained only 10 percent, we must conclude, if we are going to conclude from the mere fact of this experience, that the treaty is economically bad for us, instead of economically beneficial. But I would not be so intemperate as to make that claim here. What I am claiming is that the length of time during which any of these treaties has been in effect is too short to afford decisive evidence. Such reciprocal treaties, however, as we have heretofore lived under do afford some evidence of what the principle of reciprocity means to us, and it is rather significant that we did not see fit to maintain them.

During peace negotiations at the conclusion of the World War the United States Tariff Commission, pursuant to section 704 of title VII of the act of September 8, 1916, transmitted to the Congress a report on reciprocity and commercial treaties which shows, among other things, attempts to cultivate amicable relations with foreign states made through reciprocal provisions in commercial treaties.

We hear today the doctrine advanced that these commercial treaties will promote amicable relations and will tend to keep us out of the wars of the world. For my part, I doubt it. I believe that the more intimately connected with a foreign country we become by means of commercial ties, the more likelihood there is that we will be drawn into controversies of that country with its neighbors.

From time to time since 1854 the United States has made this beau geste both under Republican and Democratic administrations with rather disappointing results economically. The reciprocity experience of the United States, viewed in a perspective sufficiently long to minimize errors of judgment, lacks decisiveness.

Speaking of the efforts connected with the Canadian Treaty of 1854 to secure equality of opportunity in foreign markets by offering equality of opportunity to all countries seeking American markets on the basis of mutual concessions, the Tariff Commission reported:

> During the 11 years of the reciprocity period, the total trade of the two countries increased approximately threefold, and, for the United States, the trade with Canada became second in importance only to that with Great Britain. How much of this was due to the improvement in general relations between the two countries and how much to the reciprocity provisions of the treaty cannot be determined. But it may safely be asserted that its several features in reciprocity arrangement contributed largely to the very considerable growth of trade and that both countries were benefited by it.

Under the Hawaiian reciprocity treaty of 1875, extended by negotiation in 1884, reciprocity was conspicuously effective in economical benefits to Hawaii, with political benefits to the United States. The Commission's comment was:

> But when all the various factors have been taken into account, the conclusion is inevitable that the reciprocity relationship with Hawaii was economically unprofitable to the United States. However, in a comprehensive estimate the fact must not be overlooked that in entering into the reciprocity arrangement Congress had not been actuated primarily by economic considerations.

The trade treaties under the Tariff Act of 1890 providing for free entry of certain commodities between the United States and certain Latin American countries, with penalty duties against certain other countries, resulted in a substantial increase of trade in countries parties to the treaties, but these treaties were terminated in 1894 under a Democratic administration.

Reciprocity was again written into the tariff act by a Republican administration in 1897. Reciprocal commercial relations were set up thereunder with Spain, Bulgaria, Great Britain, the Netherlands, France, Portugal, and Italy, and resumed with Switzerland. These treaties are referred to historically as the Argol Agreements. They were terminated in 1909. The Commission characterized their effect upon trade as follows:

> The only general conclusion derivable is negative. When reductions obtained by agreement are few and small and are shared by all or most of the competing countries, the agreements will have very limited influence on the amount or the direction of trade.

The Commission reported on the Brazilian preferential arrangement made under the provisions of the act of 1890 as follows:

> It would appear that although preference did not secure the desired results with respect to the chief item, wheat flour, it was moderately successful in stimulating an expansion of American trade in general with Brazil.

The Cuban reciprocity treaty of 1902 expressed the fiduciary interest of the United States in the reconstruction of Cuba after the conclusion of the Spanish-American War. It was expressly specialized, and contained a provision—

> That the reductions in duty specified should not be extended to any other country.

Currently with that treaty there was in operation another prescribing the conditions under which American military authority would be withdrawn and those under which it might be reinstated in the island. The guaranty of public order which this treaty insured to labor and capital so far contributed to the commercial development of the island that the Tariff Commission reported:

> Any estimate of the effects of the first treaty must take into consideration the influence of the second.

The Canadian treaty under the present law has excited the criticism of farmers. The cause of the criticism might have been entirely prevented if fair hearings had been given agriculture before the treaty was concluded and the reduction of rates proclaimed. The same may be said with respect to lumber, which affects the Northwest, and furs, which affect the extreme South.

In passing it should be noted that this agreement is not entirely reciprocal. Canada has the benefit of the proclaimed duties under the nine treaties made effective on the same day as the Canadian treaty and subsequent thereto, so that there are added to the list of the agricultural commodities on which concessions were made in the Canadian treaty many other agricultural items by virtue of the most-favored-nation policy.

The duty on lumber was cut 50 percent. The revenue tax thereof was also cut in half, with a quantity limit on imports. We should not forget, in passing, that the lumber coming from Canada in Canadian bottoms enjoys a preferential freight rate of $3 per thousand.

The duty on cattle and calves and dairy cows was cut 33⅓ percent, with a quantity limit.

Substantial reductions were made in the duty on cream, cheese, poultry, eggs, horses, honey, fish, barley, rice, hulled oats unfit for human consumption, cereal breakfast foods, fruit, grass and other forage, crop seeds, peas—green and unripe—seed potatoes, turnips, hay, and maple sugar.

I have been somewhat interested in studying the testimony which is reported in the transcript of the hearings on the pending measure to note that frequently use is made of the relative inferiority in amount of the total imports which have come in by virtue of the concessions made by us through these treaties compared with the entire production of the country, and to note an utter obliviousness to the fact that as to many of these items the effect is concentrated locally, and the real damage is done because the imports come into just a small section or area of the country, and all the pressure of that competition is borne down on that one spot.

For example, let us take cream. If Senators will examine the record of the importations of cream under the treaty, they will discover that of the quantity, which approximated for the calendar year 1936, from all countries 44,396 gallons, from Canada 44,053 gallons, almost all of it came into the State of Vermont; namely 43,767 gallons, and there is probably no place in the United States so dependent upon the dairy industry as is the State of Vermont. It is a basic industry with us. We provide two-thirds of all the fluid milk that goes into the Boston market every morning, and the effect of the dumping of approximately 44,000 gallons of cream into the State of Vermont, in the short period since that concession was made on cream, injures us. There are men within the sound of my voice who could point to other items, the importations of which have a local effect in a competitive way. It is injurious, although it is not related at all to the ratio of the quantity that is imported to the total quantity produced in this country.

By virtue of the most-favored-nation treatment, the concessions to other countries made by us on agricultural products added to Canada's benefits reductions in duty on herring, pearl barley, preserved cherries, red clover seed, other garden and field seeds not provided in the Canadian treaty, peas, prepared or preserved, split peas, cabbage in its natural state, certain manufactures wholly or in chief value of wool, boots and shoes wholly or in chief value of leather, spring clothes pins, spools wholly of wood, plywood wholly or in chief value of birch, and potato starch.

All these concessions extend to the 48 nations with which we have most-favored-nation treaties, and to approximately 40 other nations, under the act of 1934. If a notice and hearing on these commodities had been held, it is possible that the reductions made on them would not have been made. Moreover, if hearings had been given, it is possible that the psychological effect in this country, which is exceedingly important—for public opinion is the basis of public life here; it is the strength and power and the only strength and power of any law that we make—might have been such that the farmers of this country might not have found fault with the rates and with the concessions made on their products.

The items to which I have called attention were sufficiently important to farmers to entitle them to be heard. What is more, we should have had credit for them in our trade and in our treaty with Canada.

Great Britain has benefited by all of these concessions without any treaty. She has had to make no concessions to us, and she has had a special and peculiar benefit by virtue of the Canadian treaty in this, that we have frozen for at least 3 years and 6 months the discrimination against us which she makes in the form of special privileges between herself and countries under her sovereignty.

Let me quote from the Canadian treaty.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask the able Senator if it is his opinion, because we have a treaty with Canada, that under what is known as the most-favored-nation clause we could not avail ourselves of the benefit of the most-favored-nation clause, and obtain all the benefits we extend to Canada without her extending anything to us under an obligation to do so as an exchange for what she obtained under the most-favored-nation clause?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I must confess I am not very clear as to the question.

Mr. LEWIS. What I mean to ask the Senator is this: Is it his opinion that Great Britain, recognizing that we have made a reciprocity treaty, stands upon the most-favored-nation clause to enjoy the benefit of the treaty we made with Canada, and obtains the benefits to herself under the most-favored-nation clause without extending anything toward us in exchange?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, one can readily conjecture that under the most-favored-nation treaty of many years ago—I think 1912—which cannot be denounced except upon at least 1 year's notice, and which differs from the particular extension of benefits provided in the act of 1934, Great Britain, receiving every benefit of concessions made by us to every other country as well as to the Dominion of Canada, may well not pay us any concession. Thus far she has not had to make any concessions to us. We are now bound to go on, if we continue in our policy of the Tariff Act of 1934, to make other treaties with other countries. Why? Because we have destroyed all our defenses. We repealed all the defensive provisions of the tariff law of the United States of America in the act of 1934. We are obliged to go forward under that act, or we must legislate and build up our defenses once more. Not only that, but we have contemptuously said to the citizens of America, "We are not going to be bothered with you. We will exercise this arbitrary power without any appeal by you. The rights granted to you under the tariff law of 1930 to come into a court of justice with your claim are also hereby repealed."

Mr. President, it is a natural and logical conjecture that a country which enjoys in volume great trade relations with us should sit smugly at the table and say nothing just so long as we, in the 15 treaties which we have already made and in the 80 or 90 treaties we may in the future make, extend to her all the benefits which we extend to all other countries.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. Is it not true that in addition to the advantage Great Britain gets as a favored nation in our markets, she has an advantage over us in the Canadian market through the fact that she gets the benefit of the lowest rates of duty of Canada, and our products at best get only the intermediate Canadian tariff rate?

Take, for illustration, textile goods. Textile goods enter Canada under a rate of duty which is lower than that which Canada accords to us, even under the treaty.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I answer that inquiry in the affirmative positively and with certainty in my own mind. Not only did we freeze those preferences against us, but we also froze preferences that amounted to the difference between free entry and high duty—free entry on goods from Great Britain into Canada and high duty on goods shipped by us into Canada—and we did it by this phrase, which I will read, contained in the treaty. I quote:

> The advantages now accorded or which may hereafter be accorded by Canada exclusively to other territories under the sovereignty of His Majesty the King of Great Britain, Ireland, and the British dominions beyond the seas, Emperor of India, or under His Majesty's suzerainty or protection, shall be excepted from the operation of this agreement.

In other words, our deal with Canada let down the bars by lowering duty on those very competitive articles which the President in his Baltimore speech said he had no intention of reducing. We let down the bars on agricultural products, and at the same time we said to Canada, We do not ask to have any of those advantages on these products or any other products which you have accorded to Great Britain or any country under the suzerainty or protection of Great Britain.

Thus, with one of our most important markets, one of our greatest customers, we have frozen for 3 years and 6 months a preference, to the damage of the people of this country who produce on the farms and in the factories of this country.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. I beg to say to the Senator from Vermont that the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] has just asked me if it is the clear suggestion of the Senator from Vermont and a statement from myself that should this arrangement which affects England, with respect to that which she has enjoyed, be regarded as burdensome and unjust, and should we desire to escape from the treaty, there is a clause therein which calls for notice for 1 year before we can escape the burden after having discovered the inequalities contained in the treaty?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I speak from memory, and I now have nothing better to go on but my memory of that treaty of 1912—I believe that is the one—in which we established this relationship with Great Britain. It requires a year's notice under which to denounce the treaty.

I have observed, from such a study as I could make in the brief time since these hearings were printed, that the Cuban treaty is spoken of with some pride, and spoken of as if it afforded evidence that this new policy under our Tariff Act of 1934 is beneficial to this country; and I ask the Senate to consider whether the evidence is not just exactly in the opposite direction.

The treaty with Cuba is also special and peculiar. We must in any consideration of the evidentiary effect of the treaty with Cuba recognize the cost to us of the increased business which is pointed to as arising under that treaty. I give credit to the Honorable FRANK CROWTHER, a Representative in Congress from the State of New York, for bringing it to the attention of the American people early in an address printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 28, 1936, which shows that the cost of securing business valued at $20,000,000 in 1934, $17,000,000 of which occurred after the treaty took effect, involved a loss in duties, as between the new and old tariff rates, amounting to $32,000,000; and, in addition thereto, a cost in the increase in the price of sugar paid by our citizens aggregating more than $15,000,000, making a total cost of $47,000,000. Estimating the cost for the present year he said:

> The new tax laid upon the American people for the privilege of doing business with Cuba in the present year, therefore, will amount to more than $80,000,000.

Mr. Sidney Morgan, secretary of the Tariff Commission, testifying before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives on the independent offices appropriation bill for 1938, as reported in the hearings at pages 570 to 573, showed that the duty on sugar from Cuba was reduced 25 percent under Presidential proclamation effective June 8, 1934.

Let me digress to point out that that was a reduction based upon a nonpolitical, scientific investigation by the Tariff Commission and that finding of fact ought to have been a very important factor motivating the President of the United States if he should again within a short time after that have undertaken to consider the rate of that duty. He did have to consider it very soon afterward, evidently. Having already by proclamation, based on a scientific finding, reduced the tariff 25 percent, he again reduced it by treaty to nine-tenths of a cent a pound.

I have given figures that are hardly in comparable form, so I will refer to them again. The reduction made June 8, 1934, was from 2 cents to 1½ cents a pound on raw sugar, 96° sweet. The reduction made on September 3, 1934—that is, within 6 months thereafter—was from 1½ cents a pound to nine-tenths of a cent a pound on raw sugar, 96° sweet. If the consumer in the United States had received the benefit of that reduction someone in this hall might rise and say, "Well there was at least that benefit from the transaction; there was the benefit, for example, that the wholesale price of sugar in America was reduced, or that the retail price to the housewives was reduced." But, Mr. President, do you hear anyone within the sound of my voice, whether a member of the committee or not a member of the committee, making such a claim? No; you do not. The fact is that the tables furnished by Dr. Sayre, the testimony of the secretary of the Tariff Commission, all the evidence without any controversy, prove that the first reduction in the tariff rate, as well as the second reduction resulted in no substantial reduction of the cost to the consumer.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. ELLENDER. Was there not a processing tax put on sugar at that time of one-half cent?

Mr. AUSTIN. Let us see. The date was September 3, 1934; does the Senator think so?

Mr. ELLENDER. Did not that make up the difference caused by the reduction of the tariff, and might not that have been the reason for the sugar market to remain stable?

Mr. AUSTIN. I do not think so. This would be proceeding under section 15 (a) of the Triple A Act, and nothing that I have seen indicates that to be so. Does the Senator claim it to be so?

Mr. ELLENDER. As I recall, there was placed on sugar a processing tax of a half a cent, and, as I understand, there was a reduction in the tariff duty on Cuban sugar of a little over one-half, so that with the processing tax placed on sugar it had a tendency of balancing, in a measure, the duty reduction. Therefore I do not see how the Senator can argue that there should have been a reduction in the price of sugar.

Mr. AUSTIN. I think the Senator misapprehends the law. Section 15 (a) had for its objective keeping up the duty, not lowering it. That provision of the Triple A act was to guard against the situation that if the processing tax on domestic sugar made the cost of such sugar to the consumer in America greater than the cost of imported Cuban sugar after the tariff duty was paid on it, then the President, if complaint was made to him or if he saw fit to initiate the action, could lift the tariff rate so that the Cuban sugar would not have an advantage in the American market over the domestic sugar. So I suspect that this reduction was not under the Triple A; but whether it was or not makes no difference. The proposition is that there is absolutely no evidence—not even the evidence of a temporary benefit in price reduction to the housewife—that the trade treaty with Cuba has been an economic benefit to the United States of America.

Mr. President, speaking generally of international business, the record shows that no special deduction can as yet be made from the improvement occurring since the effective dates of the 15 treaties, 10 of which are less than 1 year old. As a matter of fact, the record shows that there was an increase in general trade before ever these treaties went into effect; that is, from a low in 1932 of one and six-tenths billion dollars our exports have increased as follows: In 1933, to one and seven-tenths billion dollars; in 1934, to two and one-tenth billion dollars; in 1935, to two and three tenths billion dollars; and in 1936, for the 10 months ending October 31—we have no data for the other months—one and nine-tenths billion dollars. Thus it is seen that before ever any of the reciprocal treaties went into effect there was a gain in export trade.

There is further special evidence in the figures as to our trade relations. It is significant that our sales abroad during 1934 exceeded those of 1933 by $475,000,000, whereas our sales abroad during 1935 exceeded those of 1934 by only $150,000,000. In other words, there was less gain in sales abroad under the treaties than without them by the enormous sum of $307,000,000. Certainly the mere fact of trade expansion is not conclusive evidence, since both our import and export trade with the United Kingdom—a country with which we have not concluded an agreement—rose at a more rapid rate compared with the first half of 1935 than was the case with Canada. The experience of the last 2 years demonstrates that other factors than the trade agreement excited the growth of trade. These two treaties are unfortunate illustrations for the advocates of the Tariff Act of 1934, though they are often used as examples. They are not typical—they are extraordinary.

Mr. President, the economic situation of all countries is improved over that of 1932. For example, we find in the United Kingdom and in Sweden the index of production is now higher than it was in 1929. It is an axiom that the direction of trade is influenced largely by the price. Buyers will buy in our market if there is an advantage to them in price. They came to our markets notwithstanding the duties under the Tariff Act of 1934, as I have just proved.

Mr. President, we view, therefore, the discussion before us as largely theoretical, and so far as it affects the fundamentals of government it depends upon the character and genius of our people and their probable capacity in the future for self-government. Speed—speed of action was the underlying motive for taking the taxing power from Congress and placing it in the President. Speed was the motive asserted for taking the treaty-making power away from the Senate and placing it in the President. Even now, in relation to the pending measure, the urge for making as permanent as possible the transfer of the treaty-ratifying power from the Senate to the President is based on speed.

On the same theory that one will admit that autocracy is speedier than democracy, one can admit that the levying of taxes by proclamation is speedier than by legislation. It is admitted that one man can exercise the powers contained in the Tariff Act of 1934 more speedily than Congress can legislate rates and forms of import duties. He can amend the existing definition and classifications of articles and create entirely new definitions faster than Congress can. He can exact limitations, prohibitions, charges, and exactions other than duties imposed for the regulation of imports more expeditiously than Congress can. He can with great haste conclude the exclusive agreement with Cuba modifying the preferential customs treatment on any article.

The velocity of his action may surpass that of Congress in determining the legislative policy differently with different foreign nations. Thus, he may freeze, for the term of 3½ years, the consent of our people to tariff treatment of Canada by Great Britain and of all British countries by Canada, which discriminates against us; and he may make us pay Cuba an extravagant price for whatever increase in our exports to Cuba he may please.

However, the foregoing powers are legislative, and all legislative powers granted by the Constitution are vested in Congress. The foregoing powers relate to the treaty-making power and the Senate under the law is an indispensable agent in the creation of a treaty with a foreign power. Besides that, Congress has the sole power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imports, and excises, and to regulate commerce with foreign nations.

Speed? No great delay marks the history of ratification of reciprocity treaties in the past. The record shows graphically as follows:

The Canadian treaty of 1854 was ratified and made effective in 1855, and it endured 11 years.

The Hawaiian treaty, negotiated in 1875, was ratified in the same year 1875 and was effective 25 years. Its extension was negotiated in 1884, ratified in 1887, and that extension was effective 13 years.

Ten treaties with countries in the Western Hemisphere were negotiated and proclaimed in 1 year, 1891, and existed until 1894, when a Democratic administration denounced and terminated them.

The Argol treaties under the act of 1897 show similar promptness of action. The first series proclaimed from 1898 to 1900 consisted of treaties with France, Portugal, Germany, and Italy, and an exceptional one with Switzerland. The second series of Argol agreements were concluded after, 1906 and 1908.

Although President McKinley gave continued support to a group of reciprocal treaties negotiated under another section of the Tariff Act of 1897, they failed of ratification by the Senate largely because the Republican Party favored reciprocity only—

So directed as to open our markets on favorable terms for what we do not ourselves produce in return for free foreign markets.

President McKinley's last speech contained this statement:

The period of exclusiveness is past, the expansion of our trade and commerce is the pressing problem. Commercial wars are unprofitable. A policy of good will and friendly trade relations will prevent reprisal. Reciprocity treaties are in harmony with the spirit of the times; measures of retaliation are not.

The Argol Agreements were terminated by the Tariff Act of 1909. The treaty with Newfoundland was unratified. Therefore, speed is not a valid excuse for transferring the legislative and treaty-making power affecting the tariff to the exclusive judgment of the President.

In this case the transfer of power was made on the theory of emergency. Secretary Hull, addressing the Finance Committee, said:

There should, I repeat, be no misunderstanding as to the nature or the purpose of this measure. It is not an extraordinary plan to deal with ordinary or normal conditions nor an ordinary plan to deal with extraordinary conditions. Its support is only urged as an emergency measure to deal with a dangerous and threatening emergency situation. * * * If the emergency requiring the proposed reciprocity trade agreements did not call for reasonably prompt action in many instances the special and temporary authority asked for would naturally not be sought.

Why not? We are not left to conjecture to know that Secretary Hull regarded this means of taxation and treaty making as unauthorized. As a member of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, in his minority report on the tariff bill of 1930, which contained the flexible tariff provisions by which the Tariff Commission and the President were authorized within certain limits and based on definite standards to adjust the rates, he stated that the provisions were—

Subversive of the plain functions of Congress.

On another occasion he declared that they—

Constituted an unjustifiable arrogance of power and authority to the President.

In a speech made on May 9, 1932, in another legislative body, he asserted that these provisions practically vested in the President the—

Supreme taxing power of the Nation, contrary to the plainest and most fundamental provisions of the Constitution.

He also referred to the power granted to the President thereunder as a—

Vast and uncontrolled power, larger than had been surrendered by one great coordinate department of the Government to another since the British House of Commons wrenched the taxing power from an autocratic King.

In 1894 there was a large Democratic majority in the House of Representatives and a small Democratic majority in the Senate.

In its report recommending the repeal of the reciprocity provision of the Tariff Act of 1890, the Committee on Ways and Means of the House went on record as follows:

Moreover, we do not believe that Congress can rightly vest in the President of the United States any authority or power to impose or release taxes on our people by proclamation or otherwise or to suspend or dispense with the operation of a law of Congress.

The Tariff Act of 1934 is notably different from the acts so denounced by Secretary Hull and by the Ways and Means Committee of the House. The Tariff Act of 1934 differs from the acts of 1890 and 1930 in respect to the absence of detailed instruction affording a standard found in those acts. The act of 1934 authorizes the President to make the treaties and to proclaim the duties, restrictions, and treatment of foreign trade without instructions, the only limitation being that he may not increase or decrease rates more than 50 per centum thereof, or transfer any article between the dutiable and the free list.

The penalty for such a revolutionary departure from government by the people is felt at once. A midwestern newspaper called attention to the situation thus:

> Perhaps the heartiest chuckle Secretary Hull is enjoying these days results from the bitter charge frequently heard that the Department of State is negotiating the schedules of its reciprocal treaties "behind closed doors."

The departure from the fundamental law immediately brought to the front the danger of every such step, for it showed to our people that they could be taxed without representation. It showed that their property could be taken without their having any notice or real hearing.

The provision in the act of 1934 for public notice was construed by the President as not relating to notice of what rates and schedules are intended to be discussed. The vague provision "reasonable public notice of the intention to negotiate an agreement with such government or instrumentaly shall be given" evidently was intended merely as a pacifier, because the President wrote to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] on April 8, 1935, as shown by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 26, 1935, among other things, as follows:

> Because of this and other considerations, I believe that the present procedure of announcing only the name of the foreign country concerned and making readily available statistical and other information concerning the trade between the United States and the country is quite satisfactory.

Just think of that. Making readily available statistical and other information concerning the trade between the United States and the foreign country is satisfactory as a notice.

Mr. President, if you want to lose a pebble, throw it on the beach. If you want to lose a leaf, cast it in the forest. If you desire to hide a commodity, throw it into statistical information concerning the trade between the United States and other countries.

Citizens are not eager to beg the question with the Government. Farmers who had been informed by the President, through his Baltimore speech, that there was no intention of lowering their protection would not regard that kind of a notice as a cause for them to appear before the committee for reciprocity information. In fact, no citizen would rush in to defend a right that he did not know was going to be attacked.

I ask a question: Assuming that the commodity committee, or committees, prepare the schedules of concessions to be requested by foreign countries and the concessions which might be granted by this country, and assuming that the commodity committees prepare data with respect to a class or group of commodities to be involved in trade negotiations, would it not be feasible and wise, even under the law as it is and without any amendment of it, to make available to the public the reports of these two committees so far as they indicate what commodities and what import restrictions thereon will be considered for change, and especially if they contemplate changing the description of a schedule—for example, changing the description of what will be regarded as manufactured and what will be regarded as unmanufactured granite—so that the parties to be affected thereby may have notice before hearings and be afforded a full opportunity to present their views with respect to the specific change considered?

On competitive commodities, a rule should be fixed that the rate changes should be adjusted to equalize the difference between foreign and domestic production costs for the protection of our laborers and farmers.

I have read part of the hearings. I know it was claimed therein that it is futile to attempt to arrive at foreign costs and domestic costs. Well, the man who is in competition with foreign goods has no difficulty at all in recognizing the difference between the prices at which those foreign goods and his goods sell in the same market; and if we have not enough intelligence in our Government to ascertain the difference—at least the superficial difference, if nothing more—between wholesale prices here or landed prices here and the cost of our own production, then we had better give up; then we had better not try to compete with the rest of the world.

Another thing: Legislative policy should be determined and expressed in detail in the act relating to form of import duties, classification of articles, limitations, prohibitions, charges, and exactions other than duties imposed on importations or imposed for regulation of imports.

The most casual study of this record shows a conflict of opinion regarding the meaning of the law itself when it speaks of "charges other than duties" and speaks of "excises." It should not be left to the Chief Executive to determine the definition of what those taxes are. For that reason I am very anxious that the amendment which is offered here, which would exclude from this arbitrary power any right to levy or to interfere with our domestic taxes, should be adopted and that power removed from the bill.

The committee or other agency of government which is to pass on the public good or necessity of change should be a creature of the Congress, not a creature of the Executive, and its powers should be defined, and notices should inform the public what duties and other import restrictions are intended to be considered. Hearings should be accorded to all interested parties, not by grace, not only when the department sees fit to grant this privilege, but by the law.

I am well aware of the testimony of Dr. Sayre that since a certain time—and I am quite well acquainted with that time—the authorities have begun to practice giving an opportunity to be heard on the specific items; but we are dealing with the law. We are dealing with a means of government. We are dealing with a fundamental right of the people; and I say we cannot effectively turn over to the Executive this legislative function.

Concessions made to one country in exchange for compensating concessions should not be given general application to all other countries without compensation. Reciprocity and most-favored-nation treatments should be defined so that they cannot be made to mean one thing with one country like Great Britain and another thing with another country like Belgium. The reciprocal principle is vitiated when a country having a trade agreement with the United States permits uncontrolled entry from a third country of goods which have been subsidized in any form to a degree prejudicial to our ability to compete.

Mr. President, while we continue our generosity to all other nations, let us try to prevent injury to our form of government and hindrance of our economic recovery.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, we have had the subject of reciprocal trade agreements before this body in different forms since 1911, when the then President of the United States, Mr. Taft, sought to establish a reciprocal trade agreement with Canada. I shall come back to that later in my remarks as an illustration of what I contend—that is, that the burden of these reciprocal trade agreements falls upon agriculture. It is almost inevitable, due to economic factors, that it should fall upon agriculture.

We have been operating under the present program now about 2 years. We are able to get some idea as to its operation, and possibly form some conclusion as to its future effect.

As I understand the reciprocity principle, and as I gather that principle from those who have advocated it on other occasions, I find no objection to it whatever. But I feel that the operation of the principle under the present program is not working to the interest of agriculture. I doubt if it is in the interest of the country as a whole.

The President of the United States, in his famous letter to the London Conference of 1933, used this paragraph:

> Restoration of world trade is an important partner both in the means and in the result. Here also temporary exchange fixing is not the true answer. We must rather mitigate existing embargoes to make easier the exchange of products of which one nation has and the other nation has not.

In my opinion, that states all there is to international trade. To the extent that we can build up a trade based upon the principle of exchanging the products which one nation has and another has not, we are building upon a perfectly sound principle, and when we go beyond that it seems to me that we are no longer upon a sound principle of international trade.

I can see no possible benefit from engaging in an international trade which brings into our country that which we already have, which we are prepared to supply, and which our people are ready and anxious to supply. If we can build a trade by the interchange of those articles which we have not and which we desire to secure, or vice versa, it has its decided advantage. I repeat that in this line from the President's letter of 1933 is found, in my judgment, the extent of fruitful and desirable international trade. And furthermore, it is perfectly clear from these agreements already made that regardless of what we may do, other nations are not opening their markets to our commodities when they at home are prepared to produce them or where it is calculated to do injury to their producers. Every nation is fighting for self-containment. However much they may talk as to theories, in practice they are vigilantly protecting their own.

The President had prior to that time amplified this view in his statement in October 1932, when he said:

> It is absurd to talk of lowering tariff duties on farm products.

Why absurd? Because we have the farm products, we have the capacity to produce them to the full demands of the American market. It is unreasonable and unsound in principle to bring into the American market through reciprocal trade agreements that which we have or that which we are prepared and ready and anxious to supply. It was further said by the President:

> I declared that all prosperity in the broader sense springs from the soil. I promised to endeavor to restore the purchasing power of the farm dollar by making the tariff effective for agriculture, and raising the prices of farmers' products. I know of no effective excessively high-tariff duties on farm products. I do not intend that any such duties shall be lowered.

In my opinion that is in perfect harmony with the principle which he later announced in his letter, and a principle with which I am in entire accord. If we were engaged now, through the reciprocal-trade agreements, in interchanging those products which we have not in our market but which we desire, no possible objection could be raised to the program. But under these principles announced by the President, how can we lower tariff duties on farm products?

I think this was in a measure the idea which Dr. Sayre had in mind when the bill first passed the Senate, when he said:

> It is not to my mind a proceeding which will mean a tariff revision. It is a proceeding which will mean finding bargains which will prove of advantage to foreign trade without injury to the American producer. Those responsible for this program will have the program and a real program of finding just how trade can be increased without injury to American producers.

It has been called to our attention that this program is in harmony with the doctrine announced by President McKinley in what I believe was the last speech he ever made; and the principle announced by President McKinley was exactly the principle which was announced by the present President in his letter, to find a market for our products by exchanging the things which we are prepared to produce. One is almost forced to conclude that some of those who point us to McKinley as a justification of this program are as unfamiliar with the rule announced by McKinley as they are disregardful of the rule announced by President Roosevelt.

President McKinley said:

> The end in view is always to be opening up of new markets for the protection of our country, and granting concessions to the products of other lands that we need and cannot ourselves produce, and which do not involve any loss of labor to our own people but tend to increase the employment.

To build up our market by securing those things which we have not which other countries do produce, but not bringing into our market those things of which we have an ample amount or perhaps a surplus, as we have in regard to agriculture. I can readily support that kind of reciprocity.

As I understand the contention of the proponents, especially of the able Secretary of State, Mr. Hull, and his supporters, it is that by building up the foreign purchasing power of nations it enables them to buy our products and our commodities. That by permitting them to sell in our market and we buy of them we increase their purchasing power, and thereby increase their capacity to buy our product. That was the idea advanced by Mr. Wallace in his appearance before the committee 2 years ago. The theory is sound. But the question arises, Mr. President, when we are trying to determine how this is affecting particular products of agriculture, how does the foreigner use this increased purchasing power? Does he use it to purchase the products of the American farm, or is he using it to any extent of any moment whatever in purchasing our commodities? I think I will be able to show, Mr. President, from the records of the Government that if we have succeeded in building up the purchasing power of the foreigner he is not using that purchasing power to any appreciable extent for the purchase of American products, and especially the products of the American farm. He is purchasing those things, as we shall see, which in no sense serves the farmer of this country.

I call attention that in 1933 the agricultural exports of this country increased $32,000,000. In 1934 they increased $39,000,000. In 1935 they increased $14,000,000. In 1936 they decreased $38,000,000. It must be apparent that the increased imports in the United States of 1935 and 1936 did not help American agriculture in general. It must be apparent that if we did enlarge the purchasing power of these nations that they did not use it to purchase the products of the American farm.

Let us look for a moment at the balance of trade. In 1933 our favorable balance of merchandise trade was $225,000,000. In 1934 it was $478,000,000. In 1935 it was $235,000,000. In 1936 it was $34,000,000. It will be observed there was a falling off of our favorable balance of trade of $201,000,000 between 1935 and 1936. This item has been taken notice of by Mr. Wallace and others, and the explanation which has been advanced—I am quoting now:

> While the so-called favorable trade balance was off $201,131,000 from 1935, the position of the United States was bettered through the increased payments of interest on foreign loans—estimated by one authority at more than $350,000,000—made possible by an increase of $371,744,000 in imports.

And in an article released in London sometime ago the Secretary said:

> • • • The least controversial and most realistic way to state the situation—

With reference to the unfavorable balance of trade—> is to say that the United States in the year 1936 has probably received over $350,000,000 more in interest and dividends and payments on war debts from the outside world than she had paid out to the outside world.

The fact that the balance of trade ran against us $201,000,000 in a single year was not supporting the theory that as we build up their foreign purchasing power they would increase their purchases here and directly or indirectly our farmers would be benefited. But they were rapidly decreasing their purchases here until we were near zero on the balance of trade.

In other words, while it is conceded that the balance of trade has run against us from $235,000,000 down to $34,000,000 it is claimed that that is explained and we are compensated by reason of the fact that there has been a payment of war debts and interest on war debts and private investments to the amount of $350,000,000 or $400,000,000. Assuming, for the sake of the argument for just a moment, that that is true, I ask what benefit has American agriculture received from the transaction? If its products have been decreased in value by reason of the imports and foreigners did not purchase in return the products of the American farm, but paid interest and paid on the foreign debt, it would be of very little value to the American farmer.

But that is not what happened. In 1933 we received on war debts $20,000,000. In 1934 we received $1,000,000. In 1935 we received $396,000. In 1936 we received $396,000. And at the end of 1936 the amount previously due and unpaid on war debts had increased approximately $1,300,000,000. I presume the $396,000 is from honest Finland; she declines to repudiate her contract. It is perfectly apparent that this increased purchasing power which had been established in the foreign nations had gone neither to the farmer nor to pay the foreign debt nor the interest upon the foreign debt.

Let us look at the private investments and private debt. Perhaps this increase in purchasing power was applied there. It might have been, but it was not. In 1933 interest paid to American investors holding foreign bonds was $267,000,000. In 1934 it was $215,000,000. In 1935 it was $188,000,000. In 1936 it was $160,000,000, estimated. Even if the foreign nations had paid interest on these investments, what particular benefit would have inured to agriculture?

So the payments upon the foreign private investments had continued to fall from 1933 to 1936. Is it not apparent that they were not paying interest either upon the public debt or the private debt by reason of the fact that they had gained some advantages in our foreign market? But, Mr. President, I think it can be explained where this increased purchasing power went. The earnings of American branch factories established by the Fords and the du Ponts and the General Motors in foreign countries—in practically all the countries with which we deal—was $105,000,000 in 1933, $200,000,000 in 1934, $320,000,000 in 1935, and $400,000,000 in 1936. That is the only place where I have been able to discover that this increased purchasing power might have gone. They might have purchased the General Motors automobiles in South America, or in the Netherlands, or elsewhere, and perhaps did, with their increased purchasing power; or they might have purchased Fords, or the du Pont factories might have been accommodated—and possibly these figures demonstrate the fact that such was the case—but if the foreigners did not, then they did not use their increased purchasing power of any moment in the United States.

It will be instructive if we compare the purchases of our farm commodities and other commodities with the purchases of securities in the United States. We will see that the American farmer is suffering a reduction of his tariff, and possibly of his prices, to furnish money to enable foreigners to buy American securities.

In 1935 foreign nations purchased from the United States agricultural commodities, aside from leaf tobacco and unmanufactured cotton, of a value of $233,100,000; but they purchased United States securities to the extent of $1,411,415,000. These nations are unable to find the money with which to pay the debts they owe, but they find the dollars with which to purchase $1,411,415,000 in 1 year of American securities; and that condition, Mr. President, has ramifications other than those affecting the question of reciprocal trade agreements and their effect.

Let me go a little further with these figures. Of American farm commodities, including leaf tobacco and unmanufactured cotton, foreign nations in 1935 purchased $747,700,000 all told, as against $1,411,415,000 of United States securities.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KING. Would it not be fair to state that those investments in American securities during the period alluded to were made by private individuals, and, in part, were due to the troubled if not turbulent conditions in Europe which made those who happened to have funds a little fearful as to the results of the future and apprehensive possibly of the confiscation of their funds and property?

Mr. BORAH. Yes, Mr. President; those securities were undoubtedly purchased by private individuals generally, and so would farm commodities be if they were going to buy them. The increased purchasing power of which we speak is supposed to flow into the pockets of the people and enable them to buy more farm commodities or more merchandise of the United States. That is the theory upon which the program is built. I am only seeking to show that while individuals had money with which to buy securities, they chose to buy securities rather than to buy farm commodities.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I do not think the Senator made quite an informative answer to the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], when he said, in view of the disturbed conditions in Europe and the fear of private investors, that possibly they had sent funds here for investment instead of making use of them at home. Was not that the form of the question?

Mr. BORAH. Possibly that is true. I do not know what actuated them; I only know that the American farmer was left out of the picture; I only know that he has had the agricultural products of foreign nations put into the American market to compete with him, upon the theory that, in turn, they would buy our farm commodities, but that has not happened. I do not myself think there is scare behind these purchases. I think they were buying what they wanted and because they wanted it.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Has the Senator the figures to show whether there has been an increase of exports from the United States during the last few years into these countries with which we have trade agreements in comparison with our trade with all the other nations of the world with whom we have no trade agreements?

Mr. BORAH. I have not them all, but I have some which, I think, prove the rule. Take the Netherlands, for instance. The Netherlands purchased of our farm commodities, except manufactured cotton, in 1936, $7,700,000, but they purchased $80,469,000 of United States securities.

Mr. HARRISON. I am not debating with the Senator the question of securities. Of course, that has been bothering the Federal Reserve Board and some others in the executive department.

Mr. BORAH. It will bother us more, because it is a very serious matter, as I said a few moments ago.

Mr. HARRISON. It is a serious matter, and it may be that the Senate may vote on a proposal that will stop it at an early day.

Mr. BORAH. One way that I would stop it would be to refuse to permit the American farmer to contribute to it.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has made his statement, but the facts show, if the Senator from Idaho will permit me, that with countries with which we have entered into trade agreements in 1934 our exports were $752,000,000, while in 1936 they were $864,000,000, a percentage of increase of over 15. With all the other countries of the world with which we have not entered into trade agreements our exports in 1935 were $1,490,000,000 and in 1936, $1,559,000,000, showing an increase of only 4 percent. In other words, we have increased our exports to the countries with which we have entered into reciprocal agreements 15 percent, while we have increased our exports to all other countries only 4 percent.

Mr. BORAH. How much was the purchase of American farm commodities increased?

Mr. HARRISON. Most of the increase, in my opinion, has been in farm commodities.

Mr. BORAH. I think the Senator perhaps is mistaken about that.

Mr. HARRISON. I may be mistaken, but a good part of the increase has been in farm commodities.

Mr. BORAH. Let me give some more figures. I think we entered into one of the reciprocal trade agreements with Switzerland.

Mr. HARRISON. We did.

Mr. BORAH. In 1936 Switzerland purchased $866,000 worth of farm commodities, except unmanufactured cotton, but she purchased $167,250,000 worth of the United States securities.

Mr. President, if the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance will observe, what I am contending for is that the theory which we had in mind and upon which we built this program was that it would result in an increased purchase of farm commodities; but that has not happened, because, as I stated a few moments ago, our export of farm commodities, as compared to the previous year, decreased in 1936, $38,000,000.

In 1911 the then President of the United States, Mr. Taft, and his supporters, made no concealment of the fact that any reciprocal arrangement would inevitably fall with its heaviest weight upon agriculture, for the reason that it was our agricultural market into which foreign nations so much desired to enter, and about the only thing on which they would trade was agricultural commodities. Certain Republican leaders proposed to trade off the American farmer for the benefit of the manufacturing interests of the East; there was no concealment of the fact; and, while it is contended in the case of the reciprocal trade agreements, that a different result is happening, my observation and my investigation lead me to believe that, whatever the intention was, the same thing is happening in this case and that the great weight is falling upon American agriculture.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what particular agricultural product has been affected by virtue, for example, of the Canadian agreement to which he is now particularly referring? Does the Senator think the price of cattle has been affected by the 156,000 head permitted to come in from Canada?

Mr. BORAH. I heard the Senator say yesterday that not enough came in to make any difference; but if not enough came in to hurt the American farmer, not enough came in to help the Canadian farmer. Why the agreement?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator does not expect us to get concessions from a foreign country if we cannot give some concessions to that country, does he?

Mr. BORAH. That is what I said a moment ago: that the very nature of the situation makes it impossible to negotiate these trade treaties without putting the great burden upon the American farmer, because agriculture furnishes the commodities as to which we have got to make concessions, and agricultural commodities are the only things other nations will trade on.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not agree with the Senator about that, because, naturally, we have got a great many surpluses in certain agricultural products; it is those surpluses that affect the price of the agricultural products; and if we can find markets for them, it greatly helps the farmer.

Mr. BORAH. Everybody knows that the cattle industry has been in a distressed condition since away back in 1920. Only for short periods has it at any time during the interim been in any degree prosperous. We have had ample cattle to supply the American market. It is true that there were admitted only, as I recall, 156,000 head of cattle from Canada. Was not that the figure?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; 156,000 head.

Mr. BORAH. But I ask, in all candor, why admit any cattle into the American market when we have a surplus of cattle?

Mr. HARRISON. What is the price of cattle today as compared with the price before we entered into the trade agreement?

Mr. BORAH. The price of everything has gone up, so far as that is concerned; we are not proceeding upon the prices which were created by the depression. I say to the Senator that my personal experience covers one instance, which, I presume, might be multiplied, although perhaps not very many times; but in traveling in the West last summer I met a cattleman who had just shipped his cattle into the Omaha stockyards or Chicago—I do not remember which. He told me that on the day the cattle reached the stockyards there was a very heavy supply of cattle from Canada. Generally speaking, that would not affect the price throughout the United States, but he said it did depress the price in the stockyards at that time, on that day, and he lost a certain amount, the figures of which he gave me. The effect of the lowering of the price in the Omaha stockyards, according to the trader, would be reflected in the Chicago stockyards whether or not Canadian cattle were in that market. In other words, if the price of cattle went down to a certain point in Omaha it would likewise go down in Chicago, regardless of whether or not Canadian cattle were there.

I do not contend that the number of cattle which has been shipped in has of itself had the universal effect of depressing prices; I make no such contention; but I do contend that it is not sound to import anything into the domestic market when there is on hand a surplus which has been produced by American farmers and cattle growers. Whatever effect it has must be adverse to the producers. And if the program is continued as it is now proposed it must work very marked injury.

Mr. HARRISON. I merely suggest to the Senator that the facts revealed to the committee show that the prices had declined on other characters of cattle than those imported from Canada.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, it may be, as the Senator said yesterday, and as I understand he contends today, that the amount was not sufficient to work any permanent or universal injury to the cattle industry. That may be true. But temporary injury must become permanent if the program is permanent.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to submit to the Senator—and I do it without any information on the subject—that in passing on whether there should be any cattle admitted we should take into consideration what concessions the American Government got when it agreed to let in any cattle.

Mr. BORAH. I agree to that. If the concessions or if the general result had inured to the benefit of the cattle raiser or of the farmer by reason of the fact that he could sell more goods in this country or sell more stock in this country, if the people shipping merchandise found a market in Canada and by reason of that market they had to provide a greater supply of merchandise and therefore increased wages and increased the demand for foodstuffs and that sort of thing, I quite agree that that item should be taken into consideration. But I have undertaken to show, and it is my contention, that it has not resulted in that benefit to the American farmer.

Mr. President, I think I gave some of these figures, but I am not sure that I covered them all. Great Britain in 1936 purchased $102,400,000 worth of our commodities. She purchased $225,270,000 in United States securities.

Germany purchased $7,800,000 worth of farm products. Of course we had not any trade agreement with these nations, I understand, but Germany purchased $7,800,000 worth of farm products and $37,269,000 worth of United States securities.

The Netherlands, with whom we have a trade agreement, purchased $7,700,000 worth of farm commodities and $80,469,000 worth of United States securities.

Switzerland is another country with which we have a trade agreement. Switzerland purchased $866,000 worth of farm commodities and $167,250,000 worth of United States securities.

The grand total of the purchases of farm commodities in the United States in 1936 was $238,400,000, outside of unmanufactured cotton. The grand total of purchases of United States securities was $870,244,000.

I now invite attention, Mr. President, to some items with reference to the effect of these trade agreements upon the farm and dairy interests. I first invite attention to some testimony from Mr. Holman. Mr. Holman is the National Cooperative Milk Producers' representative in this city. At page 359 he said:

> It is perfectly apparent from the combination of these figures and the analysis of them that certain phases of agriculture are being asked to pay the cost of the trade-agreements program. This is further sustained by the Department of Agriculture's analysis of the trade with Canada, issued on December 28, 1936, in which, for the months running through the month of October, the first 10 months, they show that our imports from Canada of nonagricultural products had increased by $38,809,000. Our increases of direct agricultural products were $29,127,000.
> Our exports to Canada, for that same period, of nonagricultural products was $34,435,000, and of agricultural products only $7,809,000.

I have a letter from one of the large dairy cooperative organizations, in which it is said:

> Trade agreements have been made with Canada, the Netherlands, Switzerland, Finland, and France by which import duties on dairy products are affected. Cheese import duties have been substantially lowered and there has been an influx of Canadian cheese during 1936 of around 14 times the quantity that came from them in 1935.
> Reports are current that butter may be included in further trade agreements to come under a further lowering of the present duty of 14 cents per pound, and if this should be done, our price level on butter will drop overnight the amount of the lowering of the duty. And if our people are stampeded as they usually are, the price will be depressed several cents more than the duty reduction.
> The Department of Agriculture advocates a program of higher prices for farm products and in these trade agreements we see a program set up which has the effect of lowering those same products.
> The Dairymen's Cooperative Creamery of Boise Valley manufactures approximately 5,000,000 pounds of butter yearly. If the tariff is lowered 5 cents a pound, this would mean, in all probability, a loss to our members of $250,000 in a year's time, and assuming that we handle one-half of the butterfat in the Boise Valley, the yearly loss to the valley would be $500,000, and an immense sum to the whole industry.
> We have no objection to a truly reciprocal trade agreement; by that I mean an exchange of products under certain conditions advantageous to both parties, and such products as are not produced in both the contracting countries.

That is stating in another way and not quite so briefly the exact position stated by the President in his letter to the London Conference.

> This might be beneficial to the automobile maker or other manufacturers, but it hits the dairymen below the belt.

I ask to have the entire letter placed in the RECORD at the close of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit A.)

Mr. BORAH. I omitted a few moments ago to refer to an article, parts of which have a bearing on this question of the Government using increased-purchasing power to purchase American securities, an article written by Mr. Lindley in the Saturday Evening Post of February 14, 1937. It was a very illuminating article. From the article I quote:

> Popular discovery of the growth of a great foreign stake in the United States is menacing to at least two ideas which have been preached sedulously in this country. The first of these is summarized by the assertion that to sell more goods abroad we must buy more goods from abroad. The important place occupied by movements of capital in international transactions exposes that idea as only half true, or, at best, only theoretically and ultimately true. Likewise, if we lend more money to foreigners, we do not necessarily increase our exports, but may only provide foreigners with more dollars to invest in our own securities. Likewise, also imports of gold and silver may be converted into American investments rather than into purchases of American goods.

Mr. President, I ask that this article also may be inserted in the RECORD at the close of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit B.)

Mr. President, what is the condition of agriculture in the United States today?

In 1929 the income of the American farm was about $11,500,000,000. It dropped down in 1932 to a point where it was about $5,500,000,000. It is now back to where it is about $8,500,000,000 or possibly $9,000,000,000. It is about three or three and a half billion dollars below where it was in 1929. We know what the condition on the farm was in 1929. We know that farmers were constantly going behind on their income. We know that mortgages were being foreclosed, and that tenancy was spreading, and that the condition upon the farm was such as to call for special attention from Congress and from both the political parties. At this time, nevertheless, we are about three and a half billion dollars behind the point where we were in 1929.

Mr. President, I believe that the American market belongs exclusively to the American farmer to the full extent of his ability to supply it. I know that he is able to supply the American market today; and unless he is given the American market he cannot hope to recover the position where he has any degree of prosperity upon the American farm.

The American farmer must have the cost of production if he is to stay on the farm; and I maintain that that is utterly impossible if he is made to compete even in a limited degree with those agricultural nations which produce for about three-fourths or one-half what it costs the American farmer to produce.

I am not concerned with this particular instance or that particular instance, or the effect of this particular treaty or that particular treaty. I am concerned with the program which proceeds step by step, whether it is in the case of American cattle or babassu oil, to encroach upon the market which belongs to the American farmer. It may be small, but its effect upon him under present circumstances is very great. The competition, which seems to us here of no concern, is of very great concern to the man who ships his cattle into the stockyards; and the very fact that the manufacturer and those concerned in buying raw material as cheaply as they can buy it know that this program is in progress will cause them to purchase their raw material as scantily as possible, until, step by step, the American market is taken possession of, to a limited degree at least, by the foreign producer. Why add a single item of burden to agriculture when it is fighting for existence?

A report which was filed a few days ago shows the following facts:

> Counting only the heads of families, which in these groups include many having much more than the average number of children and dependents, the 1935 farm census listed 2,865,155 farms operated by tenants, representing 42.1 percent of the total of 6,812,350 farm operators.
> This was a percentage decrease of four-tenths of 1 percent from the 1930 tenancy ratio; but the actual number of farm tenants increased from 2,664,365 in 1930 to 2,865,155 in 1935, the number of operators in 1930 having been 6,288,648. Farm acreage, meanwhile, increased from 986,771,016 to 1,054,515,111.

These figures show, as has been shown by the report made to the President, that there are today on the American farm conditions which it is practically beyond the power of human language to describe.

We may do something for the tenant; we may give him some help; we may relieve his condition; we may loan money to the farmer and relieve his condition; but unless we give him a market at a reasonable price we cannot solve the farm question or the tenant question or the agricultural question. Unless we can find for him a market for his products at a reasonable price, it is impossible to have any permanent result from these remedies which, however humanitarian or desirable they may be, cannot be permanent in their nature.

I repeat, while we have this farm condition, and while we have the American farmer ready and prepared to supply the market, why put him in competition in any respect whatever with the producer of foreign agricultural products? Of course, it is said that that may result in a little cheaper mutton for the cities, or cheaper food products for the cities; but let me say to the gentlemen who represent the great cities and the great manufacturing centers that there is not a better market for them anywhere than a prosperous American agriculture. The American farmer is the best buyer under the flag when he has the means with which to buy; and he has not a thing on his farm today—his granaries, his barns, his fences, his plows—everything but which call for what you have to sell.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I have always said of my city that the only time we have prosperity there is when there is prosperity on the farm. The manufactured products of our city are not used in the city. They are sold largely to the farm. Therefore, so far as I am concerned, representing a large urban population, I am in full sympathy with what the Senator has said.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I was looking at the Senator from New York, but I was not singling him out particularly for my remarks. [Laughter.]

Go back, however, to the debates in 1911 and 1912, and it will be found that the great Elihu Root, and other leaders of protection, stood upon the floor here and argued that the time had come when the people would not any longer submit to having duties upon foodstuffs or farm products. When he was asked if people did not also have to wear clothes, and whether he was in favor of having duties upon clothing, he said that that was upon a little different principle. There was no concealment at that time of the fact that what was then proposed was for the purpose of enabling the manufacturers to buy their raw material in a cheaper market; and whether or not that is the design now, it is the result of the transaction.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask the Senator from Idaho, whose exposition of this problem must attract us, whether he contends, or would insist, that the remedy for the evil which he indicates exists is that of a tariff which would prohibit and prevent the shipment into America of any form of agricultural production from foreign countries?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not know that I should say that I would be in favor of an embargo upon agricultural products; but, in view of the condition of the American farmer, I think some drastic measures should be taken to protect his market.

I certainly should maintain rigidly a tariff which represents the difference between the cost of production which the farmer in this country sustains and the cost to the farmer of a foreign country. I do not know that I would go so far as to put on an embargo, but I would protect his market. I am a firm believer, especially since I have read these recent reports, in the theory that our agricultural people are passing very rapidly to a state of peasantry. Anybody who will read the report which came in, made up by the committee appointed by the President of the United States, cannot come to any other conclusion than that we have in the midst of the body politic an economic cancer which is eating the very heart out of American life. These American girls and boys on these farms have no place to go. They have no hope and therefore little aspiration. They live from day to day and from year to year and from decade to decade, if they live, utterly without any hope of escaping from the iron economic condition which has been fastened on them.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, does not my eminent friend concede that the administrations, without regard to any party alinements, have been making efforts with the object and professed purpose of relieving the very situation the Senator so aptly describes?

Mr. BORAH. I concede that every effort is being made to find a remedy. So far no effective remedy has been found.

Mr. LEWIS. Has my able friend had time to contemplate what he thinks will be a sufficient remedy?

Mr. BORAH. I am now dealing with the proposition that the basis for any successful rehabilitation of American agriculture is to give over to the American farmer the American market. That is the foundation upon which we must build.

Mr. LEWIS. The able Senator really feels that if we could convert the American market to the uses of the American farmer we would by such act protect him from the difficulties under which he presently labors?

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not contend that. I contend that is a basic consideration; but I know there are other elements which enter into it. I know that the question of interest and the question of commercial loans as applied to the farmer are crushing in their effect. He cannot live under the present commercial system so far as loans and interest are concerned. I know that also, and my opinion is that he cannot live under our present monetary system.

Mr. LEWIS. If I do not misunderstand the Senator, he feels that the remedy lies in a pretty general reform and change in the present methods touching economics generally as to all citizens, particularly as to the farmer?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I agree with that.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Idaho a question?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. I think the Senator must agree that the basic principle which he asserts must be taken into consideration in forming any sound farm policy, that is to say the American farmer is entitled to the American market if he is able to supply it. Nevertheless, the Senator leaves out of consideration the farmer who produces for export.

Mr. BORAH. I agree with that. The Senator has reference, I suppose, particularly to the cotton industry?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, Mr. President; cotton is the principal export crop.

Mr. BORAH. I am frank to say that I should be glad to have the Senator suggest what he has in mind. I do not know just what the remedy is with reference to cotton. I know that a number of the great cotton-using nations of the world are turning their attention to other countries for the purchase of their cotton. Great Britain is purchasing from Brazil, and she is also developing in Egypt.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator is quite right about that, and obviously, if the basic consideration which the Senator lays down is to form the basis of our farm program or policy, the producer of a crop sold 50 percent or more in export must abandon that crop or else he will always be at a very great disadvantage.

Mr. BORAH. I do not concede that anything I have said would affect the cotton market at all.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know that it would, but what I am trying to say to the Senator is that there are producers of farm products who have an interest in foreign commerce as well as in domestic commerce, and it seems obvious to me that the producer of cotton who sells 50 to 60 percent of his annual production in the foreign market would, upon the basis of the doctrine of American markets for the American farmer, accompanied, of course, by such protective measures as would absolutely give them to him, necessarily deprive the cotton farmer of the full enjoyment of a profitable foreign market. I am not finding fault with the Senator's proposition; I am merely calling his attention to the fact that there are farmers in this country who are dependent both upon the domestic and upon the foreign market, and in that view of it, I think they should not be greatly blamed for looking with favor upon anything which might tend to increase or better the foreign market, provided, of course, it does not destroy the domestic market of other American farmers.

Mr. BORAH. I would join the Senator in any program which would increase the foreign market for the American cotton farmer, and if the present program were working to that end I would not be discussing it now. But let me call attention to the fact that in 1933 cotton exports increased $53,000,000; in 1934 they decreased $25,000,000; in 1935 they increased $18,000,000; in 1936 they decreased $30,000,000. It does not seem that this program is having any considerable effect upon the cotton market to its advantage.

Mr. President, there are other matters touching this measure which I hope to have an opportunity to discuss later.

EXHIBIT A

DAIRYMEN'S CO-OP CREAMERY OF BOISE VALLEY,
Caldwell, Idaho, February 4, 1937.

Hon. WILLIAM E. BORAH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I feel impelled to write you today to apprise you of a grave situation that is confronting the dairy farmers of the Nation. I do this because I know of your genuine interest in the welfare of the farmers and because you are a member of our body of national lawmakers, and closely connected with all foreign affairs.

As manager of the Dairymen's Cooperative Creamery of Boise Valley, a cooperative organization owned and operated by more than 4,000 farmer stockholders for the processing and manufacturing of milk and milk products, I have first-hand knowledge as to how dairymen are affected.

I refer to the so-called reciprocal-trade agreements now in effect between the United States and other countries, and trade agreements that may be entered into. The act authorizing such agreements was signed in 1934 by the President, and unless extended will die June 12 of this year. By the terms of this act, the President is given the power to ratify trade agreements, with the only limitation that he cannot reduce duties more than one-half of existing rates.

Trade agreements have been made with Canada, the Netherlands, Switzerland, Finland, and France, by which import duties on dairy products are affected. Cheese import duties have been substantially lowered and there has been an influx of Canadian cheese during 1936 of around 14 times the quantity that came from them in 1935.

Reports are current that butter may be included in further trade agreements to come under a further lowering of the present duty of 14 cents per pound, and if this should be done, our price level on butter will drop overnight the amount of the lowering of the duty. And if our people are stampeded, as they usually are, the price will be depressed several cents more than the duty reduction.

The Department of Agriculture advocates a program of higher prices for farm products, and in these trade agreements we see a program set up which has the effect of lowering those same products.

The Dairymen's Cooperative Creamery of Boise Valley manufactures approximately 5,000,000 pounds of butter yearly. If the tariff is lowered 5 cents a pound, this would mean, in all probability, a loss to our members of $250,000 in a year's time, and assuming that we handle one-half of the butterfat in the Boise Valley, the yearly loss to the valley would be $500,000 and an immense sum to the whole industry.

We have no objection to a truly reciprocal-trade agreement. By that I mean an exchange of products under certain conditions advantageous to both parties, and such products as are not produced in both the contracting countries.

We could well exchange with some coffee-producing country, but when we get dairy products from outside they come into direct competition with one of our own basic industries. This might be beneficial to the automobile maker or other manufacturers, but it hits the dairymen below the belt.

I am aware that the impression that farmers are accepting the idea of reciprocal trade is more or less general, but the farmers are not accepting the idea of using our basic products as trading stock.

I wonder if the actual conditions surrounding this industry are clearly understood by the average Member of Congress, or whether this may be considered as a minor matter, comparatively speaking, and therefore is not receiving the attention we dairymen feel it deserves.

I am sending copies of this letter to the other Idaho congressional delegates, as I have no doubt that the Idaho delegation at times considers jointly the problems that affect the residents of their State.

I will be pleased to have your views on this matter, and if you desire further information as to how we are affected, please advise me and I will try to get it for you.

Very truly yours,

J. R. BROWN, Manager.

JEROME COOPERATIVE CREAMERY,
Jerome, Idaho, February 12, 1937.

Hon. WILLIAM E. BORAH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Knowing your interest in affairs affecting the farmers of Idaho, we are enclosing herewith resolutions approved at the twenty-second annual membership meeting of the Jerome Cooperative Creamery, held at Jerome, Idaho, February 9, 1937. For your information, the present membership of this organization includes over 4,000 farmers residing in south central Idaho.

Thanking you for any support you are in a position to give in connection with the program referred to, we are,

Yours very truly,

JEROME COOPERATIVE CREAMERY,
By ROY D. SMITH, General Manager.

RESOLUTIONS APPROVED BY THE MEMBERSHIP OF THE JEROME COOPERATIVE CREAMERY AT ANNUAL MEETING, FEBRUARY 9, 1937, JEROME, IDAHO

Resolution 1

Whereas the reciprocal-trade policy of our Federal Government has, through the reduction of tariff protection on certain dairy products, proven harmful to dairy farmers;

Whereas we have reasons to believe that additional reciprocal trade agreements, with further tariff reduction on dairy products, including butter and casein, are being considered;

Whereas we regard this program of reducing the dairy tariff structure as being detrimental to dairy farmers and inconsistent with any governmental program aimed at the achievement of better conditions for dairy farmers: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this association urge that in the consideration of any additional trade agreements no further concessions be made insofar as the tariff structure on dairy products is concerned; be it further

Resolved, That this association request that as soon as possible the tariff duties on dairy products which have been reduced be restored to the provisions as fixed in the Tariff Act of 1930.

Resolution 2

Whereas the present tax on foreign fats and oils does not adequately protect the dairy industry; and

Whereas such protection is paramount to the success of the industry: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we urge the enactment of additional Federal taxes on all foreign fats and oils which will provide a coordinated tax or tariff structure of at least 5 cents per pound on all foreign fats and oils and an equivalent rate of duty on the seeds or nuts from which these fats and oils are extracted. Where any such foreign fats and oils are now covered by trade agreements, we believe the tax should be made effective upon the expiration date of such trade agreement.

Resolution 3

Whereas oleomargarine competition continues to be one of the most aggravating problems confronting the dairy industry. During the year of 1936 oleomargarine production increased 10,000,000 pounds over the production during the same period in 1935. This increased production is occasioned in no small degree by cheap materials used by the oleomargarine industry, many of which are of foreign origin, and by the fact that the oleomargarine industry does not bear a share of the State and Federal tax burden commensurate to that being carried by dairy farmers: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the twenty-second annual Jerome Cooperative Creamery membership meeting go on record as favoring the immediate enactment of legislation imposing an additional Federal tax of at least 5 cents per pound on all oleomargarine manufactured and sold in the United States. This association further requests the enactment of Federal legislation which will prevent the shipment of oleomargarine in interstate commerce into States having oleo taxes where such interstate shipments are being utilized by the oleomargarine industry to defeat the taxes imposed upon this product by State legislatures.

CAN $8,000,000,000 STAY NEUTRAL?

By Ernest K. Lindley

For 3 years our bankers and Government officials have watched with growing concern the rise of foreign investments and deposits in the United States to the unprecedented total of between seven and one-half and eight billion dollars. These billions helped to push up the prices of American securities and piled up an embarrassing excess of bank reserves. To guard against the dangers of a speculative inflation, the Federal Reserve authorities have increased reserve requirements, and in late December the Treasury began to neutralize the effect of the continuing inflow on our banking system by sterilizing new gold imports in the currency-stabilization fund. The possibility of a temporary unsettlement of our financial markets and banking system by the sudden withdrawal, in the form of gold, of any substantial amount of these foreign deposits and investments also has caused some concern.

But for 3 years the gravest danger of this huge foreign stake in the United States received no more than the barest of passing attention. That danger is the use that could be made of these foreign investments and deposits in the event of another World War.

This foreign stake is a potential war chest. It is stored-up buying power. In large part, it could be withdrawn in the form of American raw materials and manufactured products. In the event of major wars abroad, some of it almost certainly will be withdrawn in exactly that way, unless the United States adopts effective preventive measures. Up to now, we have taken no such measures except an embargo on the export of actual munitions to nations at war. Except for a limited number of manufactured products under the heading of "arms, ammunition, and implements of war", this foreign stake in the United States is capable of creating for us the kind of war boom which we experienced in 1915 and 1916, and which, if it was not the underlying cause of our entry into the World War, at least created an economic condition which made it extremely difficult for us to remain aloof.

As the outlook in Europe and the Far East has become more ominous, the American people have shown in many ways that they are at present determined to have no part in any war abroad. Congress enacted the Johnson Act, closing the American loan market to nations which have defaulted on their debts to us. It passed temporary neutrality legislation in August 1935 and renewed it in amplified form last year. The present neutrality legislation expires on the 1st of May, but certainly will be reenacted in some form. Meanwhile the Senate munitions investigation, under the chairmanship of Senator GERALD P. NYE, had made its intensive study of American policy from 1914 to 1917, and of the circumstances of our entry into the World War.

All this activity has been inspired by a determination to learn and apply the lessons of 1914–17, with the hope of preventing a repetition of the consequences of that period to us.

WAR PROFITS

Underlying all the efforts to remove, in advance, incidental causes of controversy which might imperil our peace has been a growing realization that if we are to remain at peace we must prevent a war boom. Walter Millis, in his Road to War, and the studies of the Nye committee have shown how a swelling tide of prosperity, induced by war orders, swept us in 1914–17 to the point where, when the financial resources of the Allies were exhausted, we could no longer have remained aloof without precipitating a depression at home. The basic importance of preventing a war boom is recognized even by those who hold that in the event of a general war in Europe it will be impossible for us to remain neutral in fact—they bolster this view largely by the argument that our manufacturers, merchants, and farmers will not be able to resist the opportunities to make money. Certainly, if general wars occur, pressures at home are likely to make difficult the maintenance of self-denying legislation. These pressures may be manageable if we can prevent the growth of a boom based on war trade. But if we allow our productive system to be geared up to supply an export market suddenly expanded by the demands for goods from belligerent nations, certainly the difficulty of preserving our neutrality during a prolonged war will be greatly increased.

The main purpose, probably, of the ban on credits and loans to belligerent nations is to prevent the growth of such a war boom. This purpose is also inherent in the proposal of Bernard M. Baruch that we limit our sales to belligerents to what they can buy with cash and carry away in their own bottoms. It has been widely assumed that if we don't extend credits or loans, belligerent nations will be unable to obtain the dollars with which to buy large quantities of our products in wartime. This assumption has been encouraged, perhaps unintentionally, by the pleas of certain nations that they were unable to make payments on their war debts to us. It has been encouraged, too, by constant emphasis on the fact that the United States is now a creditor nation, whereas in 1914–17 it was a debtor nation. In 1914 several billion dollars of foreign investments in this country, with only a small offset in American investments abroad, were the evidence of our indebtedness to the world. The sale of a large part of these foreign investments in the United States was one of the main sources of the foreign purchasing power which produced the war boom of 1915–17. The transfer of gold to the United States was a second major source. Loans and credits were the third—but it is often forgotten that most of the private loans and credits extended to the Allies before our entry into the war were based upon collateral, and a large part of this collateral consisted of foreign-owned American securities. Thus the foreign stake in the United States, or as much of it as could be commanded by the Allies, was used in two ways to build up our war boom: By selling American securities and using the dollar proceeds to buy our goods, and by posting them as collateral for loans which, in turn, were used to buy our goods.

THE DANGER OF ANOTHER WAR BOOM

Now we are a net creditor Nation. If the war debts are counted, our claims on foreign nations substantially exceed foreign claims on the United States. To what extent, if any, we are a net creditor nation if war debts are excluded depends largely on how some of our dubious foreign assets are valued. But our net position is not of primary importance in considering our vulnerability to a war boom. For foreign investors and depositors enjoy the right to withdraw their investments and deposits, when they wish, in gold or goods. We do not enjoy the same privilege with respect to many of our holdings abroad. We would be likely to lose the privilege in a few of the countries where we still enjoy it, if they went to war, and our investors might not exercise the privilege even if they had it. In short, foreign nationals or their governments can convert their stake in the United States into goods and present us with a war boom without expecting, under existing law, any substantial offsets or retaliations, such as by the withdrawal of American investments abroad.

Although we are a net creditor Nation, we are also a debtor Nation to a greater extent, probably, than ever before in our history. Our extreme vulnerability to a war boom is indicated by the fact that foreign investments and deposits in the United States are now from three to three and one-half billion dollars greater than they were estimated to be at the outset of the World War. The December 1936 issue of the Federal Reserve Bulletin estimated the size of this foreign stake in the United States at from six to six and one-half billion dollars in long-term investments, of which, perhaps, two-thirds are readily marketable stocks and bonds, plus nearly one and one-half billion dollars in short-term balances, as of September 30, or a grand total of from seven and one-half to eight billion dollars. The commonly used estimate of the extent of foreign investments in the United States in 1914 is $4,500,000,000. The part of this smaller sum which was under the control of the Allies was quite ample, in conjunction with loans and gold shipments, to create for us a full-sized war boom.

During the World War, about half of all foreign investments in the United States passed into the hands of American owners. The foreign stake accordingly was reduced to a low point of approximately two and one-quarter billion dollars. Much of the undisturbed balance was owned in nations which had remained neutral during the World War, or was in the form of real estate and other tangible properties owned in belligerent nations, although the British retained until the end, and were allowed to take home, a large bloc of American securities that they had posted as collateral for loans.

During the post-war period, foreign funds again flowed into this country in large amounts. In effect, a substantial part of the dollar exchange which we made available to foreigners by our lavish lending during the post-war decade was used by them to buy American securities. During the early depression years, both American-owned and foreign-owned capital flowed out of this country. But, with the devaluation of the dollar and its return to a modified gold-bullion standard in January 1934, the flow of capital again headed into the United States.

THE FOREIGN STAKE IN THE UNITED STATES

Until now, except for a short period while we were in the World War, we have never tried to keep an accurate check on the movement of investment funds in and out of our country. At the end of 1935 the Department of Commerce took a census of foreign investments in the United States. Although it had to rely on estimates for some items, its conclusion that foreign long-term investments here totaled more than $5,000,000,000 is probably the most reliable available figure. Beginning January 1935, the Treasury Department has tried to keep full statistics of capital movements between the United States and foreign countries and of purchases and sales of foreign exchange in the United States. By combining the Department of Commerce and Treasury data and making allowance for rises in the value of securities, the Federal Reserve Bulletin achieved its estimate that as of September 30, 1936, foreign long-term capital in the United States totaled between six and six and one-half billion dollars, apart from approximately one and one-half billions in short-term capital. The heavy inflow of short-term capital was attributable in part to successive financial and political crises in the former gold-bloc countries. Only a few degrees removed, of course, are the main reasons why foreign money has sought haven in the United States during the last 3 years—fears of wars or civil disturbances abroad, combined with the prospect of making a profit here.

The Department of Commerce census separated long-term investments in the United States at the end of 1935 into the following categories:

[In millions of dollars]

Common stocks (market value)	2,015
Preferred stock (par value)	329
Bonds (par value)	607
Direct investments (book value)	1,045
Other investments (various bases of value)	1,039
Total	5,035

The foregoing table does not include the already liquid, short-term balances, which amounted to almost one and one-half billion dollars on September 30, 1936. Money of this type shifts easily. Short-term balances in this country, on the outbreak of another war, might be either substantially larger or smaller than they are now. In the quick movements in international finance which would occur on the outbreak of war they might be partly canceled by the withdrawal of some of the short-term balances we have abroad. These amounted to more than $800,000,000 on September 30, 1936.

Direct investments, as totaled in the table, are for the year 1934, but the figures from the Treasury indicate that only about $24,000,000 in new foreign capital was added to direct investments during 1935.

More important than the aggregate figures is the geographical distribution of the ownership of these investments and deposits. With respect to long-term investments at the end of 1935 the Department of Commerce found this to be as follows:

[In millions of dollars]

	Direct investments	Common stocks	Preferred stocks	Bonds	Other investments	Total
Canada	322	408	66	49	161	1,006
Great Britain	362	372	146	91	403	1,374
France	14	142	19	53	54	282
Netherlands	249	196	13	220	106	784
Switzerland	13	214	32	65	75	399
Other Europe	62	350	30	87	123	652
Latin America	5	19	3	8	8	43
Other countries	18	314	20	34	109	495

Almost 70 percent of long-term investments of all types were owned in European nations. Great Britain alone owned more than 27 percent. Great Britain and Canada together owned more than 47 percent. Great Britain, Canada, and France, combined, owned almost 53 percent. Judging from past experience, the ultimate ownership of many investments made via other nations is likely to lie, or to be controlled, in Great Britain. Even without allowance for that, a war which found the British Commonwealth of Nations and France fighting on the same side would find them in possession of half of the foreign stake in the United States. A large part of the balance rests in the hands of friendly powers or neutrals where British and French finance are influential.

THE BRITISH LION'S SHARE

We imported more than $225,000,000 in new British capital during the first 9 months of 1936. With the rise in security values, Great Britain's direct claims on us may now aggregate in the neighborhood of $2,000,000,000. Canadian claims probably have risen to one and one-half billion dollars or more. By mobilizing the investments of her nationals and those of her allies and economic affiliates, Great Britain might be able to muster a grand total of $5,000,000,000 or more in claims on the United States—more, incidentally, than our claim on Great Britain on account of her war debt to us, and probably more than the total of our private claims on Great Britain. By selling to residents of the United States some of her choice investments in Canada, Argentina, and other countries at a discreet distance from the theater of war, Great Britain probably could add a few billion dollars more to the total sum of American dollars on which she could put her hands.

ECONOMIC SUCTION

A mere two or three billion dollars, used rapidly for the purchase of American supplies, would be enough to give us a good size war boom. That much or more is readily available to the British Government in bank balances and easily marketable American securities.

During that portion of the World War in which we were a neutral, our exports to the four great Allies—Great Britain, France, Russia, and Italy—were worth approximately $7,000,000,000.

If general war breaks out again in Europe the economic suction applicable to us through the conversion of foreign savings in this country into purchasing power would be fully as great as that applied to us in 1914–17. To an even greater degree than then, this suction is likely to come from one direction, Great Britain.

During the World War, the British treasury mobilized, from among British investors, approximately $1,423,000,000 worth of American securities. It sold about two-thirds of these in the United States and used the remainder as collateral. In addition, it mobilized and sent to the United States, as security for loans, several hundred million dollars' worth of Canadian, West Indian, Egyptian, New Zealand, South African, and South American bonds, followed finally by some British railway and municipal bonds. But even when Great Britain was fighting for its very existence, it conserved as best it could its great international investment fund which represents its commercial empire.

During the Nye investigation, the late Henry P. Davison, Morgan partner, was quoted as having told the Federal Reserve Board, as late as November 1916 that he thought the British were holding back from $500,000,000 to $800,000,000 in first-class American securities. That was near the peak of the Allied financial crisis. After the war the British took home a huge bloc of securities which they had deposited in this country as collateral for private loans, including some $350,000,000 in American securities. Yet they sold what they needed to sell to obtain our goods. During the first three-quarters of 1916 the sale of American securities in the United States through J. P. Morgan & Co. provided more than one-third of the revenue used to buy war supplies from us.

Modern war requires the full mobilization of a nation's resources at home and abroad. If another general war comes, nations will commandeer the foreign investments of their nationals. Recently Germany and Italy have shown the extreme devices to which governments can resort when they are in imperative need of foreign exchange. There are devious ways by which particular investments may escape detection or commandeering, but the great bulk of the foreign investments of any nation strong enough to remain united in war can be mobilized and used to such purposes as its government deems useful and other nations will permit.

Popular discovery of the growth of a great foreign stake in the United States is menacing to at least two ideas which have been preached sedulously in this country. The first of these is summarized by the assertion that to sell more goods abroad we must buy more goods from abroad. The important place occupied by movements of capital in international transactions exposes that idea as only half true, or, at best, only theoretically and ultimately true. Likewise, if we lend more money to foreigners, we do not necessarily increase our exports, but may only provide foreigners with more dollars to invest in our own securities. Likewise, also, imports of gold and silver may be converted into American investments rather than into purchases of American goods.

The second major conception that is disrupted is that some of our war debtors have been unable to make payments because they have been unable to obtain dollar exchange. Of particular nations that is true, but of others it obviously is not, since their citizens have been able to obtain dollars in ample amount for investments—investments which, in turn, can be commandeered in wartime by their governments and used to buy American goods.

A STITCH IN TIME

This train of thought may suggest that it also would be possible for the Government of the United States to seize control of investments which belligerent nations have in this country, to assure that they are not used in any way inimical to our own interests. In the event of major wars abroad, the sterilization of some of these foreign funds in the United States might suggest itself as sensible. We could afford to let them be withdrawn in gold, of which we have a troublesome surplus.

To permit them to be withdrawn in valuable American materials and manufactured products would demonstrate again our celebrated capacity for quixotic generosity mixed with immovable determination to get our fingers burned.

Our present neutrality legislation contains nothing designed to cope with the dangers of a war boom inherent in foreign investments and deposits in this country. Nothing suggested during the congressional hearings and debates on neutrality legislation would touch them except a general embargo on exports or Secretary Hull's proposal that exports to belligerents of materials used in war be limited to normal peacetime quantities. Either would be difficult to administer. A general embargo would so disrupt our own economy as to be unenforceable, in all probability. Secretary Hull's normal-trade formula aroused vigorous resistance when the administration attempted to apply it by moral suasion during the Ethiopian crisis.

Congress apparently thought that it was striking at the root of the dangers of a war boom and of economic alliance with belligerent nations by a ban on credits and loans. But the Nye committee threw a bright light on the chain of economic causes and consequences in 1914–17.

THE LESSON OF 1914

As early as October 1914, by a verbal approval quietly conveyed to interested bankers, President Wilson exempted credits from the ban on loans to belligerents laid down in August by Secretary of State Bryan. By the summer of 1915 we were enjoying a thriving and growing export trade, but it was evident that it could not be maintained much longer unless loans were extended. The choice was between lending money to our customers and precipitating a domestic depression. The administration removed the ban on loans. Loans were made, the Allies sent us more gold and more American securities, and in 1916 our prosperity zoomed.

To strengthen his hands in negotiating with the British concerning interference with our mails and our trade with neutral nations, Congress gave the President the power of embargo. But he could not use it without hurting ourselves as well as our best customers.

When the Allies reached the end of their ability to borrow private funds, we entered the war and financed their purchases, as well as most of our own enormous war needs, with Government credit.

Whatever view one may hold of the specific causes of our entry into the World War, economic suction drew us toward the Allies. In another war the United States might consider it to be to its national interest to profit as much as it can and while it can from exports, even if that trade is largely or exclusively with one side in the conflict. But it should not start along that road without the realization that a halt is likely to be difficult, if not impossible, and without recognizing that an economic alliance behind the lines is likely to be only the prelude to an alliance on the battlefront.

Without effective control over the use of foreign investments in the United States in wartime, we may rapidly lose the chance to make a cool choice. The ban on loans and credits, desirable as it is, would not be effective, because several possible belligerents already have a large supply of dollars in the form of American securities and bank balances.

A war boom started by cash buying would be no less difficult to handle than one started with loans. It might easily brush aside our present noble determination that it shan't happen to us again.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, it is evident that we cannot finish the consideration of the joint resolution this afternoon. Several Senators have inquired of me whether there will be a vote today. I assume there will not be a vote this afternoon, but it is hoped that before adjournment today some kind of an agreement can be entered into which may limit discussion on the joint resolution and amendments to 10 or 15 or 20 minutes for each Senator.

Mr. HARRISON subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow, February 25, 1937, beginning at 3 o'clock p. m., no Senator shall speak more than once nor longer than 30 minutes on the joint resolution and 15 minutes on any amendment that may be offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUGHES in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I believe in reciprocal-trade agreements if and when they are the product of the considered judgment of the representatives of American labor, agriculture, and industry, worked out openly by students of domestic and foreign trade whose first loyalty is to our own people, brought to action without damage to our domestic markets, and affording opportunity for an interchange of commodities which can be produced elsewhere to a better advantage for us than in our own borders.

Mr. President, House Joint Resolution 96 provides for a 3-year extension in the life of the so-called Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act enacted June 12, 1934, and which will expire on June 12 of this year. This act goes much further even than tariff revision, in that it permits agreements with foreign countries that Congress will not, for a series of years, exercise its right to revise what the President does. It goes still further in that it permits revision of the revenue laws, excise taxes, and so forth, and apparently permits agreements with foreign countries that Congress will not, for a series of years, exercise its right to impose excise or other taxes, for revenue or other purposes, or to revise excise and other taxes now on the statute books. Furthermore, the act does not provide for "reciprocity" in the generally accepted meaning of that term.

The act of 1934, which it is proposed by House Joint Resolution 96 to extend for 3 years, provides that any rate of duty may be increased or decreased by not to exceed 50 percent of the rates in the Tariff Act of 1930. It is significant that in the dozen or more agreements already entered into there have been no increases in rates. In other words, the whole program has been a general downward revision of all rates. An analysis of the progress to date shows 448 reductions in rates of duty, as follows:

	Reductions
On agricultural products	99
On fibers and textiles	56
On chemicals, oils, paints, etc	58
On earths, earthenware, and glassware	36
On metals and manufactures	116
On wood and manufactures, including paper and books	24
On sundry miscellaneous products	58

Mr. President, in order not to be unfair, it should be added that in a few cases, where the countries dealt with were the principal suppliers, duties were not reduced but bound against increase. Thus, while 448 reductions were being made, 49 items were bound against increase; but many of these were duplicates. When duplicates are eliminated, it appears that only 28 rates of duty were left without reductions but with an agreement made that present rates would not be increased. Furthermore, while trading with these countries, 78 different items on the free list were bound with agreements that Congress would not place duties upon them.

So the result of the so-called reciprocal-trade agreements thus far has been to make 448 reductions in rates of duty, to bind 28 rates of duty against increase, and to bind 78 items on the free list. It seems clear to me that in no case was there an increase in rate of duty; and Congress not only has delegated this authority to revise the tariff generally downward but apparently has delegated authority to agree that in the future Congress will not change any of these rates.

WHAT IS THE BASIS FOR THE REDUCTIONS MADE?

Mr. President, apparently it is the opinion of the President and the distinguished Secretary of State that rates of duty in the Tariff Acts of 1922 and 1930 were too high. Let us go back and examine past experience. For 150 years we have been trying to raise the standards of living of American workmen and farmers. One important way has been to shut out cheap labor and cheap goods, whether made by workers in factories or by farmers. It is not necessary here to review the first 100 years—1775 to 1875. Let us look at the record since 1875.

From 1876 to 1880 the ratio of duties to value of dutiable goods imported averaged 43.77 percent. From 1881 to 1885 the ratio was 43.15 percent; from 1886 to 1890 it was 45.89 percent; from 1891 to 1895 it was 47.39 percent; and from 1896 to 1900 it was 46.65 percent. Thus, for the 25-year period 1876 to 1900 the average ratio of duties to value of dutiable goods imported was 45.37 percent.

Mr. President, we now come to the pre-war period—1900 to 1915. During that 15-year period the average ratio was 43.35 percent. It was slightly lower than for the 25 years 1876–1900 because of reductions in the Underwood Act of 1913.

Rates of duty under the Underwood Act of 1913 continued during the war and until the emergency act of May 27, 1921. Prices during the war period were so abnormal, and trade so disturbed, that rates of duty meant little. So let us look at the rates of duty from 1921 to 1935—the post-war period of 15 years. The average ratio of duties to value of dutiable goods imported for this 15-year period was 41.75 percent.

To summarize, the ratio of duties collected to value of dutiable goods imported—

	Percent
For the 25 years 1876–1900 averaged	45.37
For the 15 years 1900–15 averaged	43.35
For the 15 years 1921–35 averaged	41.75

Mr. President, from this it does not appear that rates of duty on the whole were higher on the average since the war than from 1875 to 1915.

In contrast we find that during the first 11 months of 1936 the average of all rates of duty to values of dutiable imports was down to 38.7 percent. It is perfectly obvious that the whole program, if carried through, is a general reduction; and apparently, when the job is completed, the average will be down to not more than from 20 to 30 percent.

WHAT IS THE TEST AS TO RATE OF DUTY?

Mr. President, a hundred years ago our policy was to impose duties on practically all imports. Revenue, as well as protection to infant industries, was involved. From 1820 to 1830 only 6 percent of our imports were free of duty. By 1875–80 we allowed about 33⅓ percent of all imports to come in free of duty. This included such items as tea and coffee, silk, bananas, and so forth, which we did not produce. As time went on, the percentage free of duty increased. By 1900–1915 almost 50 percent of our imports were free of duty, and from 1920–35 almost 66⅔ percent were free of duty.

During that period imports of dutiable goods increased in spite of the tariff. Even though duties averaged from 40 to 45 percent, our imports of dutiable goods increased as follows:

Average annual imports:	Dutiable imports
1901–05	$528,061,000
1906–10	712,721,000
1911–15	731,887,000
1921–25	1,333,816,000
1926–30	1,374,740,000

Mr. President, the collapse in imports from 1930 to 1935 was due to the collapse in prices and the general depression, not in any degree to the rates of duty or the tariff. This is easily demonstrated. Here are the figures:

Calendar year	Imports for consumption		Dutiable imports
	Total imports	Imports free of duty
1929	$4,338,572,000	$2,880,128,000	$1,450,444,000
1933	1,433,013,000	903,547,000	529,466,000
Decrease	2,905,559,000	1,976,581,000	928,978,000
Percent decrease	66.9	68.6	63.7

Here we see that the value of imports free of duty declined 68.6 percent between 1929 and 1933. Certainly this was not due to the tariff, but to price decline and the depression. Decrease in value of imports subject to duty was 63.7 percent, or slightly less, and this decline was due to the same causes.

Mr. President, we now have clearly before us the question, What is the test as to rate of duty? Goods which we do not produce, but need, such as tea, coffee, cocoa, silk, rubber, bananas, and so forth, we keep on the free list; goods we can produce as cheaply or more cheaply than can other countries, such as middling cotton, we keep on the free list; but goods produced by cheap foreign labor, or controlled by foreign cartels and monopolies, and which are put into our markets in competition with our own products our tariff laws should protect. We must protect our own market in order to protect our farmers and wage earners.

What is the measure? How much tariff do we need? Each product is a problem by itself. On some items 5 percent or 10 percent is enough to protect our market. Sometimes it is necessary to have 33⅓ percent to 50 percent. Our test for many years has been the difference between the cost of production in the United States, with our hours much shorter than in most countries, with our wages higher, and so forth, and in the principal competing country.

If wages are low, hours of labor long in a foreign country, and standards of living are correspondingly low, frequently their cost of production is much lower than in this country.

They can enter our markets and either force our wages down and lengthen our hours of labor in an effort to meet the foreign competition or force our people out of employment.

Mr. President, the Tariff Act of 1922 carried a provision that if any citizen thought the rates of duty too high or too low, he might appeal to the Tariff Commission to make an investigation, and there was provided a way to raise or lower the rate of duty according to the facts. Hundreds of investigations were made and many rates of duty were either raised or lowered. This was a truly scientific way to check our tariff. In 1930, when Congress reviewed the entire tariff, again provision was made for necessary investigations and changes in rates to fit new conditions or changes in costs here or abroad. The purpose was to protect the American market for the American farmers and factory workmen.

What do we get under the so-called Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act of 1934? No tests as to foreign costs, wages, hours, or other items; no check against lower standards of living in other countries, or longer hours, or lower wages; no check on foreign cartels and monopolies. Unemployment is still with us; we shall see our wage earners increasingly losing their jobs as imports increase, or see them forced to work longer hours or accept lower wages in order to meet the foreign competition; and we shall see our farmers forced to accept lower prices for their products in order to hold the home market against an ever-increasing flood of imports.

Mr. President, already the movement has begun. With only a few trade agreements in effect, our imports in 1936 increased over 1935 from $2,038,905,000 to $2,421,056,000, an increase of $382,151,000, or 18.7 percent.

We were told that our exports would increase even more because of concessions other countries would grant to us and because others would buy from us if they could sell to us. But what has happened? Our exports increased between 1935 and 1936 from $2,243,081,000 to $2,416,477,000, an increase of only $173,396,000, or only 7.7 percent. So our imports increased more than twice as much as our exports. Evidently we are giving most of the concessions and getting little in return.

It has been said that if we did not import, we could not export—the foreigners could not buy our surplus farm products or our factory products. But it now appears that foreigners are shipping us not only more goods, but gold and silver, and instead of buying from us, they are buying our stocks and bonds and investing their surplus in this country. The plan has already failed. Why extend it another 3 years?

ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW INDUSTRIES

Mr. President, for more than a hundred years we have been building up our standards of living—raising wages, shortening hours, building better and more efficient factories, fostering inventions and new discoveries, and above all encouraging new industries so as to give profitable employment to our ever-increasing population. We have been building the policy of "the American markets for our own American farmers and factory workers." Now, under the new policy, we are opening up the American market for the low-cost' goods from foreign lands and not even getting equivalent concessions from them in return. Last year imports increased $382,151,000 over 1935, while exports increased only $173,396,000 over 1935. Thus imports increased over $200,000,000 more than exports.

Much of the increase in exports which we did make was to help Europe prepare for war. What if Europe should declare a "5-year peace program"? Much of our exports to them would disappear and our imports from them, under this trade program, would increase by leaps and bounds.

Lower wages, longer hours, increasing unemployment, lower prices for our farmers, these would be some of the penalties we would pay. We would be forced to defend ourselves against low foreign wages, long hours, low living standards, low price levels, foreign cartels, monopolies, and so forth.

Mr. President, is it not highly significant that evidently great care has been taken not to negotiate agreements as yet with countries which ordinarily would ship large quantities of manufactured goods to us, which at the same time have low production costs, low wage rates, long working hours, and so forth, such as Japan, the United Kingdom, Germany, Italy, and others?

In 1931, according to the list of countries furnished by the Assistant Secretary of State, the Honorable Francis Sayre, our dutiable imports were valued at $709,199,000. Dutiable imports from Belgium, Brazil, the Netherlands, Sweden, and Switzerland combined amounted to only $76,171,000, or less than 11 percent of the value of all dutiable imports. Most of the imports from Cuba consisted of sugar, which does not compete with American factories and organized labor. Most of the imports from France are made up of luxuries such as wines, perfumes, and so forth. Most of the imports from Canada are lumber, pulp, pulpwood, paper, and so forth.

Dutiable imports from the United Kingdom alone amounted to $66,113,000 in 1931, or about equal to those from the five countries noted above. Dutiable imports from Germany amounted to $84,093,000, or more than those from the five trade-agreement countries combined. Italy and Japan sent us dutiable imports valued at $78,843,000, or more than those from the five countries combined.

Mr. President, have agreements with United Kingdom, Germany, Japan, been delayed to quiet the fears of organized labor? Will trade agreements now be negotiated when a new 3-year extension is granted and the election is over? When these industrialized countries have completed their preparedness programs and the products of millions of soldiers and other millions of factory workers are offered for sale in our markets after our tariff has been reduced to a nonprotective basis, what will be the reaction of our wage earners, organized and unorganized?

CAN WE NOT AGREE ON SOME CONCESSIONS BY THE ADMINISTRATION?

Mr. President, if the administration is determined to go forward with this program for another 3 years under House Joint Resolution 96, will it not grant some concessions to our own people?

First. Will it not agree to examine the difference in cost of production between this country and the country with which it is negotiating? Will it not at least check wage levels, hours of employment, standards of living, and other items?

Second. Will it not at least agree not to negotiate with those who are in default or refuse to pay their debts to us?

Third. Will it not agree to limit the concessions to the one country with which it is dealing?

Fourth. Will it not agree to leave out further reductions in our internal taxes and promises to foreign countries that such foreign countries shall henceforth decide for us what taxes we shall impose?

Fifth. Will it not agree to submit agreements, when made, to Congress or at least to the Senate for study for a 30-day period before they are made effective, thus giving the representatives of the people a chance to suggest errors or changes?

Sixth. Will it not make public the terms of the agreement it has tentatively entered into and give the American citizens a 30-day chance to study them and file suggestions? American farmers, manufacturers, and laborers should have at least a chance to study the proposals and a chance to make suggestions.

Seventh. Will it not at least make public all of our economic transactions with each country, not just merchandise exports and imports, but also exports and imports of gold and silver, capital transactions, invisible items such as shipping, insurance, tourists' expenditures, and status of war debts?

Eighth. If the administration will make no concessions except to the foreigners with whom it is negotiating and is determined to go through with a complete general revision downward of every item in the Tariff Act and thus reverse the 100-year policy of this country, should not Congress write into House Joint Resolution 96 as a reservation an escape clause claiming the right to cancel all these agreements whenever it gets a mandate from the people, without being put in the position of breaking what are in fact treaties with all foreign countries?

Mr. President, I desire now to refresh the memory of the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], with reference to the long fight in the Congress and the great service he rendered to the country in passing restrictive and selective immigration laws in the years 1921 to 1924.

As Secretary of Labor for 10 years and responsible for the administration of our immigration laws, I know the demands that certain countries are constantly making to increase their quotas of immigrants, and especially the demand that has been and is now being made to extend the quota limitation law to the oriental and barred-zone countries. My experience as administrator of our immigration laws prompts me to inquire whether the delegated powers now exercised by the State Department relating to tariff agreements and treaties will be assumed in the future by this Department to apply to immigration laws as well? Will the proposed legislation be used to set aside our immigration laws? Will foreign countries use it as an entering wedge to barter away our rights of protection in the now barred zones of China, Japan, and India? Will the proposed legislation carry with it further commitments of delegated power in fields not now under our consideration?

With American machinery and the products of our heavy-goods industries moving into Europe and Asia with increasing economic force, what further invasion of our protective rights may we not soon expect? In the neighborhood where I was born in South Wales a $40,000,000 strip mill is now being erected. I am told that its product can be made at such low cost that it can be produced there and sold here so as to compete successfully with our domestic market under our present tariff schedules. With foreign labor abundant, wages low, hours long, and with our tariff protection falling, the prospect of work for those who are now unemployed in America under the proposed legislation is far from bright.

Mr. President, we must keep in mind that the American market has a buying power equal to that of all of Europe and, in light of that fact, we are called upon to determine how much of our market we wish to share with the rest of the world and upon what terms.

Many plans are being launched today to increase our foreign trade, which is now and has been but a very small fraction of our total trade. All of us are interested in foreign trade. It is important. Complete isolation is certainly impractical. We should do business with every country in the world that has something to sell without detriment to our own producers. In other words, that which we cannot produce we should buy from others, and others in turn should buy from us the things they cannot as satisfactorily produce as we can.

Mr. President, we have no assurance that the reduction of our tariff as accomplished during the last 3 years will result in increased business advantages to our own country, for the savings thus secured to others may often be used for their trade elsewhere rather than with us. Personally, I should want to make a close inspection of imports to ascertain the number of factories which we shall be forced to close down if we give a part of our own productive trade to foreign competitors.

This afternoon I listened with great interest to the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. I fully agree with the following statement which he made in the course of his remarks:

> I believe that the American market belongs exclusively to the American farmer to the full extent of his ability to supply, and I know he is able to supply the American market today.

I, too, Mr. President, believe that the American market belongs to American labor and American industry to the full extent of their ability to supply it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I send to the desk a telegram bearing on the subject under discussion which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the clerk will read, as requested.

The legislative clerk read the telegram as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1937

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Thou Almighty One, changeless from age to age, on Thee we build our faith. We can trust Thee in darkness and in the light, for ourselves and all whom we love, for time and eternity. Our Father, enable us to accept what cannot be avoided and sustain us with the peace of God, the higher calm and the eternal poise. Do Thou enrich us with Thy grace; it ripens to sweetness and joy; it softens prejudice and weakens bigotry and makes more beautiful this world home of ours. Blessed Lord, be Thou the comforter of any who may be suffering from undue care and anxiety; be with those of our Members who are ill. We beseech Thee to penetrate the shadows and give promise of health and strength. Merciful Father, draw very near our beloved Speaker and the Congress. In our Savior's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

H. J. Res. 212. Joint resolution to amend the act entitled "An act to levy an excise tax upon carriers and an income tax upon their employees, and for other purposes", approved August 29, 1935.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. J. Res. 84. Joint resolution to authorize the Postmaster General to withhold the awarding of star-route contracts for a period of 60 days.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution on February 23, 1937:

PUBLIC WORKS ADMINISTRATION

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged report on House Resolution 121 for immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 121

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby requested to furnish the House the following information:

(1) A list of non-Federal projects pending in the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works, which have been approved by said Administration but for which allocations have not been made because of lack of funds available to such Administration for such projects, such list to indicate as to each project (a) its location; (b) its type; (c) its estimated cost; (d) the amount of loan requested; e) the amount of grant requested.

(2) A list of non-Federal projects pending in the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works, which have not yet been finally disapproved by said Administration, such list to indicate as to each project (a) its location; (b) its type; (c) its estimated cost; (d) the amount of loan requested; (e) the amount of grant requested.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the report may be read. It is very brief.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

I understand that these P. W. A. proposals were submitted to the Members of Congress and that we had that information.

Mr. COCHRAN. The information, I may say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, is in my office and will be in the office of the Committee on Expenditures, where any Member of Congress can see it. There is, therefore, no reason for the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. RICH. That is what I understand, that the gentleman has the information, and that it can be obtained in his office.

Mr. COCHRAN. I am going to move to lay the resolution on the table if the gentleman will give me the opportunity.

Mr. RICH. If this information were printed, would the cost come out of P. W. A. funds or Interior Department funds?

Mr. COCHRAN. It would come out of funds of the Congress.

Mr. RICH. I appreciate that, but where are we going to get the funds?

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on Printing. It cannot be printed, under the rules, unless the gentleman's committee authorizes it to be printed.

Mr. RICH. If the gentleman has the information in his office, I can promise him that its printing will not be authorized.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri that the report be read?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

[H. Rept. No. 295, 75th Cong., 1st sess.]

DIRECTING THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR TO FURNISH THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES WITH A CERTAIN REPORT

Mr. COCHRAN, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments submitted the following adverse report (to accompany H. Res. 121):

The Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments to whom was referred the resolution (H. Res. 121) requesting the Secretary of the Interior to furnish certain information relative to non-Federal projects pending before the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works which have been approved by said Administration but for which allocations have not been made because of lack of funds, to the House of Representatives, having considered the same, report thereon with the recommendation that it do not pass.

The Federal Emergency Administrator of Public Works has submitted to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments the information desired in the resolution and it is on file in the office of the committee, room 304, House Office Building, where it can be seen by anyone interested.

The letter received from the Federal Emergency Relief Administrator of Public Works which accompanied the report follows:

FEDERAL EMERGENCY ADMINISTRATOR OF PUBLIC WORKS,
Washington, February 23, 1937.

Hon. JOHN J. COCHRAN,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. COCHRAN: In the absence of Administrator Ickes, I have your letter of February 18.

In response to your request, I am enclosing for the information of your committee the material which would be furnished to the House of Representatives in the event that House Resolution No. 121, introduced by Mr. BEITER, of New York, were acted upon favorably.

Sincerely yours,

HORATIO B. HACKETT,
Assistant Administrator.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, the resolution speaks for itself. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COCHRAN. I yield for a question only.

Mr. MAPES. Inasmuch as this information has been prepared by the Department and furnished to the gentleman's committee, what would be the objection to transmitting it to the House so that every Member could have the benefit of it?

Mr. COCHRAN. That would require that the report be printed. The Committee on Expenditures does not desire the report printed. It therefore can be printed only as a document, by the introduction of a resolution referred to the Committee on Printing, reported, and passed by the House.

Mr. MAPES. But if the gentleman's committee should make a favorable report upon this resolution it would be passed by the House; that action would authorize the printing of the information.

Mr. COCHRAN. The committee does not feel justified in expending the amount of money necessary to print this report.

Mr. MAPES. How much would it cost to print it?

Mr. COCHRAN. I am not a judge of that; the Committee on Printing can decide that; offhand I would say at least a thousand dollars.

Mr. MAPES. Certainly we do a lot more printing that is a great deal more expensive for things which are of very much less importance.

Mr. COCHRAN. It is a matter over which I have no control.

Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER (after counting). One hundred and thirty-five Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 20]

Aleshire	Ditter	Lanham	Schulte
Allen, Del.	Englebright	May	Shannon
Bernard	Ford, Miss.	Meeks	Snell
Buckley, N. Y.	Gasque	Mosier, Ohio	Stubbs
Burdick	Goldsborough	Mouton	Sweeney
Chapman	Hancock, N. C.	Nichols	Tolan
Cluett	Higgins	Norton	Towey
Crowe	Jenks, N. H.	Parsons	Wolcott
Dies	Johnson, Minn.	Rogers, Okla.
Dingell	Knutson	Romjue

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and ninety-three Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

On motion of Mr. RAYBURN, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, for the moment I withdraw my motion in order to make a brief explanation for the benefit of Members who were not on the floor prior to the roll call.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COCHRAN. I will yield to the gentleman in just a moment.

Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Expenditures, I called up a privileged resolution introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEITER], which requested certain information from the Public Works Administration relative to pending projects. The Public Works Administration has supplied the Committee on Expenditures with the desired information. The committee therefore directed me to make an adverse report, which I have presented.

This information is in possession of the committee, and any Member who desires to see it may see it at any time.

I now yield to the gentleman from New York for a question only.

Mr. TABER. Do I understand this information is available so that any Member may see it?

Mr. COCHRAN. Any Member of Congress or citizen may see it.

Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion was agreed to, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, I have not been permitted to speak on this resolution; therefore I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD at this point on my own resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the gentleman does not intend to include the report from the P. W. A., copy of which I gave him?

Mr. BEITER. No.

Mr. COCHRAN. I refer specifically to the report made by the Public Works Administrator?

Mr. BEITER. No.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, I have a resolution now before us requesting the Secretary of the Interior to furnish the House with a list of non-Federal projects pending in the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works which have been approved by said Administration and for which no allocations have been made because of lack of funds. The resolution would also authorize the Secretary to furnish a list of non-Federal projects now pending before the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works which have not been finally acted upon by said Administration.

From conversations I have had with various Members of the House, it is clear that the intent and purposes of the resolution are not fully understood, and I take this opportunity, with your kind permission, to explain my reasons for presenting the resolution at this time.

I have previously introduced in the House a bill to extend the authority of the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works for 2 years from June 30, 1937, and to authorize an appropriation of $300,000,000 to be used in allocating funds for projects already approved by the Public Works Administration and for which no funds are now available. This list of approved projects totals 2,940 and represents the efforts of various municipalities throughout the country to restore purchasing power through the construction of useful public works and the encouragement of long-range planning in the field of public works.

Many of these municipalities have gone to great expense to draft plans for these projects, and in most cases referendums have been held and the voters have agreed to share the cost of the construction. The projects have been reviewed and approved by the engineering, finance, economics, statistics, and legal divisions of the Public Works Administration, and the municipalities have been led to believe that allocations will be forthcoming in the form of loans and grants to cover the cost of the work. Allotments for work are made on the basis of social benefit, economic feasibility, and financial, legal, and engineering soundness. To deny the municipalities who have approved projects pending an opportunity to benefit from the public-works program would result in unduly burdening the communities involved with debt or causing them to abandon altogether their long-range public-works programs of development.

Requests for a break-down by States of the projects included in this list of 2,940 have been coming in such frequency at the Public Works Administration offices that it is not always possible to furnish the information when desired. These requests usually include an inquiry regarding the nature and type of project, the amount of loan and grant, and the status of same, as well as the estimated cost. Time and expense are involved in furnishing detailed information of this character.

The list of pending non-Federal projects which have not yet been finally acted upon by the Public Works Administration totals 1,754, bringing the total of projects in both lists to 4,694. Every State in the Union is represented in this list, and I dare say every Member of this House is interested in one or more of the projects included therein. It is safe to assume that every congressional district in the United States has a project of some kind included in that list, whether it be a waterworks development, a sewer project, municipal power plant, hospital building, school addition, highway construction, bridge construction, or projects for the transmission of electrical energy.

I have proposed that a complete list of the projects pending be submitted to the House, but I am not going to press for action on this resolution but will submit today another one authorizing the printing of 5,000 copies of the list of pending non-Federal P. W. A. projects which have been approved or which have not yet been finally disapproved by the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works. My purpose in doing this is to provide each Member of the House and Senate and others interested with a copy of the list, since I believe this information to be of widespread interest not only to the Congress but to the public bodies, municipalities, school districts, drainage districts, and others who have been induced to undertake construction of useful works. Certainly it will prove helpful to every Member of the Congress who is called upon to furnish information concerning the status of pending projects to the applying municipalities in his district.

I hope that each Member of this House will join with me in asking for favorable action on this resolution so that full information regarding this important matter may be made available not only to us but to those in our congressional districts who have a vital interest in the public-works program.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. WILCOX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow, after the reading of the Journal and disposition of business on the Speaker's table, I may be permitted to address the House for 25 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there are two Members on this side who would like to speak tomorrow. We have withheld asking unanimous consent because we thought an appropriation bill was coming up for consideration and general debate would be in order. May I ask the majority leader what the program is for tomorrow?

Mr. RAYBURN. On yesterday, after the death of our colleague the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, the members of the Subcommittee on Naval Appropriations felt that they did not care to go ahead tomorrow. Therefore there is nothing on the program for tomorrow, and I have accordingly suggested to several gentlemen who have spoken to me about getting time to speak that they submit a unanimous-consent request to address the House tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow, after the reading of the Journal, the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table, and the previous order heretofore made, I may be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow after the reading of the Journal, the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table, and previous orders heretofore entered, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] may be permitted to address the House for 25 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow, after the reading of the Journal, the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table, and the previous orders heretofore entered, I may be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow, after the reading of the Journal, the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table, and previous orders heretofore made, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] may be permitted to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD in reference to the subject of an interstate sales tax.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by including therein a speech delivered by myself over the radio.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

FOOD, DRUGS, AND COSMETICS

Mrs. O'DAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mrs. O'DAY. Mr. Speaker, I am getting a great many inquiries from women all over the country asking what action Congress is taking in protecting consumers of drugs, food, and cosmetics. They call my attention to the necessity for action on the drugs and food bill, because of the harm that is being done by the misleading and fraudulent advertisements of patent medicines during the last influenza epidemic. In spite of the fact the United States Public Health Service has so widely advertised that there are no preventives for flu and that preventive medicine or cures should not be depended upon, many people who are easily fooled have depended on such so-called cures until it was too late for medical care to save them.

The Federal Government at present has no way of preventing these misleading advertisements. A food and drugs bill was brought in about 3½ years ago, but no action has been taken on it, and the women of the country have asked me to bring this matter to the attention of the House. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including an editorial written by Charles E. Broughton, editor of the Sheboygan Press, one of the leading papers of Wisconsin, on the President's program.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to object to that request.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow, after the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table and after the previous unanimous-consent requests have been finished, I may be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow, after the other speeches have been concluded, I may be permitted to address the House for 25 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to insert a short reference to George Washington, prepared by myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAINES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting in the Appendix thereof an address delivered by Mr. Harllee Branch, the Second Assistant Postmaster General, before the Transportation Club.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this by the Second Assistant Postmaster General?

Mr. HAINES. Yes; it is not a political address. It is a speech delivered before the Transportation Club in the city of Washington.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have no doubt it is excellent; but, Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mrs. O'DAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a radio speech delivered by me.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein a speech which I delivered recently.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE RECORD

Mr. BOYLAN of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOYLAN of New York. Mr. Speaker, I take this occasion to say a few words to the House in connection with the objections raised here to printing certain matter in the RECORD. Sometime, several years ago, I made a campaign about this matter and considerable debate was had and a more liberal spirit existed in regard to inserting matters in the RECORD. Lately, during this session, there appears to be a reversal of opinion relative to this practice. I have always felt, and I feel now, that the House has taken the part of the subservient member of the legislative body of this great country. We are apparently suffering from an inferiority complex; we are worrying about the cost of printing matters in the RECORD; and yet, what do we find? We permit ourselves to labor under a delusion, because if a matter is offered here and objection is made by some one of the great watchdogs of the Treasury, immediately the Member whose request is refused hies himself to another part of the Capitol and presents the matter to another Member of Congress; and, lo and behold, what was refused here is permitted over there, and the next day we see it in the RECORD. I cannot understand why the House takes this attitude. I would heartily agree if the same methods were pursued at the other end of the Capitol; but if we are going to be the small boys of the Congress, resting under the lash of the big brothers on the other end, naturally that is a matter for us to consider.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN of New York. Yes.

Mr. RICH. I may say for the information of my colleague that at the last meeting of the Joint Committee on Printing the Senators made the statement to the Members of the House that they were going to try, if possible, to keep the RECORD a record of the proceedings of the House and Senate, and they were going to do all within their power to eliminate from the RECORD all the articles published by individuals outside, so that one would know that it is a record of the actual proceedings of the House and Senate which it is supposed to be. And I feel sure they will try their best to do so.

Mr. BOYLAN of New York. Oh, that is the old story. I have heard that for years, yet they go on merrily printing editorials and magazine articles and every conceivable kind of manuscript, and yet here when we request that an address which has been delivered by some official of the Government be inserted in the RECORD we are denied that right. When are we going to wake up?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN of New York. Yes.

Mr. RICH. Was the gentleman ever denied the privilege of putting anything in the RECORD that he would like to, so far as his being a Member of the House of Representatives is concerned?

Mr. BOYLAN of New York. Yes.

Mr. RICH. Then the man who denied the gentleman that privilege ought to be shot. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOYLAN of New York. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN of New York. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH], a distinguished member of the Joint Committee on Printing, could work this out readily, if he would, by getting the Senators on that committee to object in the Senate to the insertion in the RECORD of any matter which has been refused insertion in the House.

Mr. RICH. I will say to the gentleman from New York we tried to get them to do that, and I think we are going to get some real action on that point from the Senators, and I am in hopes that they will ask every Member of Congress if he tried to have it inserted in the RECORD in the House; and if he gives the Senator an affirmative reply, then the Senator should have the courage to say "no"; I will not have it inserted in the Senate if you have been refused permission in the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BOYLAN of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 or 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for 2 or 3 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOYLAN of New York. The gentleman has hopes that something will be accomplished, but I have no hope, because I have been watching this thing now for about 15 years. We hear the same old story. Always somebody springs up here and says, "Oh, we have to keep down the cost of printing", yet the other body keeps right on piling it up. When are we going to get away from this inferiority complex? Are we not of equal importance with another branch of the Congress, or are we willing to be considered the small boy, the subservient member of the family, always yielding to the elder one, letting him do as he wishes, while we do as we are told? Let us have it either one way or the other; let all the matter go in here that is requested, the same as in the Senate, or cut it all out. I would be in favor of limiting matter in the RECORD, if it is the will of the House or the Senate, to matters actually spoken of and discussed on the floor; but if we are going to inject extraneous matter, let us do it as well as the other body.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN of New York. Yes.

Mr. RICH. Would two wrongs make a right?

Mr. BOYLAN of New York. Oh, the gentleman gets up here and shouts, "Where are you going to get the money?"

Mr. RICH. And the gentleman has never found anyone on his side of the House who can answer it, nor on this side as well.

Mr. KELLER. I did.

Mr. BOYLAN of New York. I never heard the gentleman answer his own question.

Mr. RICH. I am unable to answer it; the question is a great one.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has consumed 2½ minutes.

Mr. BOYLAN of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 30 seconds.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN of New York. I yield.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Has the gentleman in mind the amount of money that printing and binding costs the Government?

Mr. BOYLAN of New York. I do not think the Appropriations Committee has ever objected to the cost of printing the RECORD.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. I find that the departments are spending millions, but we deny ourselves the right to get a reflection of public sentiment in this country as evidenced in editorials and other such expressions. I think it will be found valuable 50 years from now to know what influenced the Congress in the formation of Government policy. I think it is appropriate and very valuable that such matters should go into the RECORD.

Mr. BOYLAN of New York. There is no question about it; I agree with the gentleman entirely. [Applause.]

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. BOYLAN] to Government expenses; now I refer to the statement of the condition of the United States Treasury issued by Mr. Morgenthau on February 19, which I hold in my hand, showing the national deficit to be $34,550,781,583.15. The statement also shows that on that date the receipts were less than the expenditures by $15,449,540; that is about the average daily loss. Total expenditures this year over receipts has been $2,002,576,248.72.

I wish the gentleman from New York, or somebody on his side of the House, would tell us where we are going to get the money. It is high time Congress does economize. [Applause.]

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday. The Clerk will call the first committee.

Mr. CHANDLER (when the Committee on the Judiciary was called). Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Judiciary, I call up the bill (H. R. 137) to amend section 64 of the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subdivision 5 of paragraph (b) of section 64 of the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"(5) wages due to workmen, clerks, traveling or city salesmen on salary or commission basis, whole or part time, or servants, which have earned within 3 months before the date of the commencement of proceedings, not to exceed $600 to each claimant.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the House Calendar. The gentleman's request is not necessary. The gentleman is recognized.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I introduced this bill in the previous Congress. It passed the House by unanimous consent.

Mr. Speaker, this is merely a clarifying amendment. Some referees in bankruptcy permit a traveling salesman to make claims as wages for commissions that are owed him; other referees in bankruptcy do not. It is to give the traveling salesman the same right as that enjoyed by every other employee of a corporation or partnership that goes into bankruptcy that this amendment is offered. That is all the bill does. I am sure all agree the salesman working on a commission should be recognized the same as any other employee in bankruptcy proceedings.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be heard on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I think everybody who understands this bill is for it. I do not think there should be any opposition to it. The bill merely takes care of the commission man—the wage earner working on a commission—as it takes care of the man working on a salary.

The necessity for this bill was brought about during the depression when practically all traveling salesmen were laid off. Their employers could not hire them longer on a salary basis, but said to them they could continue to sell on a commission basis. Such a man went out on his own resources; he had no guaranty. It might happen that, while he was working, his employer went into bankruptcy. This man then found himself in a position different than he would be in had he been working on a salary. The pending bill gives him the status of a salaried employee—a wage earner. I hope everybody will support the bill.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Why is the amount limited to $600?

Mr. MICHENER. To bring the commission man under this bill he has to be treated as the ordinary wage earner. If the gentleman is familiar with the bankruptcy law he will appreciate the situation. It is reasonable protection.

Mr. CRAWFORD. In many lines of industry a man working on commission may in a day sell goods to keep his customers going from 3 to 6 months. In that one day his earnings may be $1,500 or $2,000, but he may not earn any more for 6 months.

Mr. MICHENER. The purpose of this section of the bankruptcy law is the protection of wage earners in a reasonable wage. It must be remembered that under the original bankruptcy law a wage earner was declared to be a person who earned not more than $1,200 a year. This is a very fair provision.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CHANDLER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ESTABLISHMENT OF A TERM OF UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT AT ORLANDO, FLA.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Judiciary, I call up the bill (H. R. 2905) to amend an act entitled "An act providing for the establishment of a term of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of Florida at Orlando, Fla.", approved June 15, 1933, and ask unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act providing for the establishment of a term of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of Florida at Orlando, Fla.", approved June 15, 1933, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding at the end thereof the following proviso, to wit: "Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent the construction of quarters for the officers of said court and appropriate courtrooms for the holding of the sessions of said court in any new Federal building which may be constructed in Orlando, Fla."

With the following committee amendment:

On page 2, line 1, strike out "construction" and insert in lieu thereof "provision."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. WILCOX].

Mr. WILCOX. Mr. Speaker, the bill now before the House is not a bill I introduced, but in view of the fact I was the author of the original bill establishing the United States court at Orlando, my colleague the gentleman from Florida [Mr. HENDRICKS] asked me to make a brief explanation of the purposes of this bill.

The act establishing a term of court at Orlando provided that the city of Orlando should supply to the United States Government, without cost, the quarters within which to hold court. Since that time the Federal Government has determined upon the possibility of constructing a new Federal building in that city.

The present bill simply provides that in event the Federal Government does build a new Federal building in the city of Orlando nothing in the act establishing this term of court down there shall be construed as preventing the Government from making provision for a courtroom in its new building. In other words, unless and until the Government decides to build and does actually construct a new Federal building, the old arrangement will continue. The city of Orlando will continue to furnish a courtroom and quarters for the officials of the court.

Mr. Speaker, this bill does not request the expenditure of any additional sum of money, nor does it require the Government to go to additional expense; but in event the Government does build a new building it will include quarters for a court in such new building as may be constructed.

Unless there is objection to the passage of this bill or there are questions that may be pertinent, I believe that is about the only explanation that I care to offer at this time. If there are any questions as to the propriety of the bill, I shall be glad to answer any question which any Member may wish to ask.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILCOX. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman used very adroit language when he said the "possibility of the construction" of a building had been determined upon. I think that is true to an extent. The possibility of construction has been determined upon, but the actual construction has not been determined upon. For my part, I want it distinctly understood—and I think this is the feeling of the committee—when we passed the bill in the last Congress it was understood there would be no expense attaching to the United States Government, and that court would be held in quarters provided by the city of Orlando. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. WILCOX] has just stated that this measure would not involve the expenditure of an additional penny.

Here is what this will do: If a post-office building is constructed, additional quarters will be required for the holding of court, and this will include not only a courtroom but a complete set-up in the way of floor space for a marshal's office, a clerk's office, and so forth, and that will cost additional money. If court is held, quarters must be provided. The next thing that will follow will be the appointment of a United States marshal at Orlando, and following that a clerk will be appointed for Orlando. This bill should not be passed with the understanding it is not going to involve additional cost, because it is. First the building will cost more, if they are to construct a building there. I want the Procurement Division to take notice of what is stated here today when they are determining upon the possibility of constructing a building down there, and understand that it is not necessary to build this building because of court necessities.

Mr. WILCOX. May I say to the gentleman, in order that he may understand the exact situation which exists, the city of Orlando is located in almost the exact geographic center of the State of Florida. It is a very rapidly developing city and in a rapidly developing section.

The Procurement Division and the Post Office Department have found that the present quarters in the post-office building are inadequate even for the post office itself.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. WILCOX. Mr. Speaker, in addition to the necessity for enlarged post-office quarters, there are located in the city of Orlando the branches of various Government activities, such, for example, as the collector of internal revenue, the Agricultural Department, and various other agencies of the Government. Those offices are scattered throughout the city in privately owned office buildings, and the rentals paid involve considerable expense to the Government. The Procurement Division, while it has not definitely determined it will build a new building down there, has reached a point in its consideration where it is now preparing plans for a building. In those plans they are providing not only for quarters for the Post Office Department but also providing offices for the Treasury Department, for the collector of internal revenue, the Department of Agriculture, and the various other Government activities. The Procurement Division has suggested in view of the fact they will probably construct a new building in that city in the near future that the Federal Government should house all of its activities in its own building.

Mr. Speaker, the city of Orlando has no desire to welch on this proposition of furnishing quarters. Until a new Federal building is built the city of Orlando is perfectly willing to continue its bargain, even though it may run a hundred years, of supplying quarters for the United States court and the officials thereof. It seems only reasonable, in view of the fact the Government is going to build a building to house the Post Office, the Treasury Department, the Agricultural Department, and other Government activities, that it should include quarters and a courtroom for the United States court. Of course, a building that is big enough to have a courtroom will cost a little more than a building that is not big enough for a courtroom, but may I call attention to the fact this will have to be a two-story building, anyway, because a one-story building would not be sufficient, and the additional cost of constructing a courtroom in this Federal building, if and when constructed, will not be sufficient to cause us a great deal of anxiety about additional cost.

Mr. MICHENER. How long does the court sit in Orlando each year?

Mr. WILCOX. I believe the court sits there 6 weeks out of the year.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILCOX. Yes; I yield to my colleague from Florida, who is thoroughly familiar with the facts.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I would like to correct the statement of my colleague the gentleman from Florida. The court sits in Orlando 3 months out of the year.

Mr. MICHENER. I may say to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. WILCOX] that he usually convinces us because he is sincere. I am sure the gentleman will do just what he says he will do, and I am sure Orlando will do what it has stated it will do, if it is in the gentleman's district, and I make no further objection.

Mr. WILCOX. Mr. Speaker, Orlando is not now in my district, but it was at the time of the passage of the original act. It was because of my statement to the House when you passed the original act for me to the effect that the city of Orlando would furnish quarters without cost that I am now taking up the time of the House to make this explanation.

The author of this bill is my colleague the gentleman from Florida [Mr. HENDRICKS], who now represents the territory in which the city of Orlando is located, and he asked me to make this explanation because of my familiarity with the original act.

Mr. GREEN. If my colleague will yield, is it not a further fact that this court at Orlando serves an unusually large territory and a great number of people?

Mr. WILCOX. It is my understanding, from what my colleague the gentleman from Florida [Mr. HENDRICKS] has told me, that approximately 35 percent of the business of that division of the southern district of Florida is transacted in this court at Orlando.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DRIVER). The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there any further business from the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. WALTER. No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, this is the Judiciary Committee's day, and the committee instructed its chairman to call up the bill (H. R. 2260) providing for appeals when constitutional questions are raised, which is a part of the President's proposal.

This bill was introduced in the Congress January 8, before the President made any suggestions. It was given thorough consideration by the Committee on the Judiciary and was to be considered on our last Calendar Wednesday day, when suddenly the House was adjourned in the middle of the afternoon. This is our next day, and it is possibly the last day we will get this session. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER] will call up this bill that the President wants considered. It has the approval of the committee and would have passed the House on last Calendar Wednesday if the majority leader had not adjourned the House.

Mr. WALTER. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded. The Clerk will call the roll of committees.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, where a bill has been reported favorably by a committee, and the chairman of the committee is authorized to call the bill up on Calendar Wednesday, when the chairman absents himself from the floor, and when other members of the committee are present, is it proper for one of the other members to call up the bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman that under the rules only the chairman or the member designated by the committee is authorized to call up a bill.

Mr. MICHENER. I thank the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will call the roll of committees.

COLLATERAL SECURITY FOR FEDERAL RESERVE NOTES

Mr. STEAGALL (when the Committee on Banking and Currency was called). Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Banking and Currency, I call up the bill (S. 417) to extend the period during which direct obligations of the United States may be used as collateral security for Federal Reserve notes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the second paragraph of section 16 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"Any Federal Reserve bank may make application to the local Federal Reserve agent for such amount of the Federal Reserve notes hereinbefore provided for as it may require. Such application shall be accompanied with a tender to the local Federal Reserve agent of collateral in amount equal to the sum of the Federal Reserve notes thus applied for and issued pursuant to such application. The collateral security thus offered shall be notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or acceptances acquired under the provisions of section 13 of this act, or bills of exchange endorsed by a member bank of any Federal Reserve district and purchased under the provisions of section 14 of this act, or bankers' acceptances purchased under the provisions of said section 14, or gold certificates: Provided, however, That until June 30, 1939, the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System may, should it deem it in the public interest, upon the affirmative vote of not less than a majority of its members, authorize the Federal Reserve banks to offer, and the Federal Reserve agents to accept, as such collateral security, direct obligations of the United States. At the close of business on such date, or sooner should the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System so decide, such authorization shall terminate and such obligations of the United States be retired as security for Federal Reserve notes. In no event shall such collateral security be less than the amount of Federal Reserve notes applied for. The Federal Reserve agent shall each day notify the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System of all issues and withdrawals of Federal Reserve notes to and by the Federal Reserve bank to which he is accredited. The said Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System may at any time call upon a Federal Reserve bank for additional security to protect the Federal Reserve notes issued to it."

Mr. WOLCOTT rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Michigan rise?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I thought possibly, for the benefit of the House, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL] would wish to take 5 minutes to explain what the bill is, and that I might take 5 minutes later on in further explanation.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, on February 27, 1932, the Congress passed an act authorizing the Federal Reserve Board, as it was called at that time, now the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, to permit the use of Government obligations as collateral security for Federal Reserve notes. At that time there were outstanding $4,497,000,000, in round figures, of Federal Reserve notes, secured by $2,400,000,000 of gold certificates and only $900,000,000 of eligible paper. Our supply of gold at that time—our complete stock of gold—amounted, in round figures, to about $4,000,000,000. Paper covering commercial and agricultural transactions, that made up the eligible securities used by the Federal Reserve banks as collateral for Federal Reserve notes, had dwindled to the amount of $900,000,000, so that we were maintaining as cover for Federal Reserve notes somewhere above 80 percent in gold, whereas the requirements of the law necessitate the use of only 40 percent of gold as a basis for Federal Reserve notes. There were many reasons for the action that was taken that would require considerable time to explain. Everybody understands that the depression was on, that currency was being hoarded, that banks were failing, and many of them that had not closed were in embarrassment. The act was in the nature of a relief measure. Our gold position was imperiled, the country at that time being on the gold standard, and there being large foreign balances, and gold, of course, being liable at any time to be withdrawn to a point that would be embarrassing to the Government. In 1933, on the 3d day of March, we passed an act extending the original 1932 act for the period of 1 year, and on March 6, 1934, we passed another extension act for the period of 1 year, with authority conferred on the President to extend for an additional year, and an order was granted by the President providing such extension, so that this authority will expire on the 3d day of March 1937.

At the moment there may not be any overpowering necessity for the continuance of this law, but certain it is that eligible paper in the Federal Reserve banks has dwindled to a vanishing point at this time, such paper in the Federal Reserve banks at this time amounting to what is comparatively speaking the infinitesimal sum of $4,000,000. So that as a precautionary measure that seems clearly justified by the experience of the years in which we found ourselves in so much difficulty, and in order to safeguard possible unfortunate developments in the future it is desired that this authority be continued as provided in the measure before us for an additional 2 years. In conclusion, I wish to say that the bill was reported favorably by unanimous vote of the Committee on Banking and Currency, and simply continues existing law upon which the Congress has voted directly three times in the past.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last two words. The Republicans on the Banking and Currency Committee did not see fit to contest this bill in the committee for the reason that there is an academic question involved which we thought we might have some time to discuss on the floor, realizing also the futility of trying to defeat a measure merely upon the premise that it is inconsistent with an announced policy on the part of the administration. This bill is, as the chairman has said, and as the Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve Board has said, inflationary in character in that it is for the purpose of offsetting an outflow of gold from the United States, or in any other manner to bolster up the commodity price index by cheapening the purchase power of currency by increasing the volume of Federal Reserve notes. I point that out to show that at the present there is a studied endeavor on the part of the Federal Reserve Board to prevent inflation or an unwarranted, unnatural rise in the commodity price index by raising reserve requirements, thereby stopping the flow of credit which naturally flows from banks to industry and agriculture and business, and it is anticipated that in the near future there will be a rise in the rediscount rates as well as reserve requirements for the same purpose. On the one hand the policy of the Federal Reserve Board is deflationary in that we are blocking up this flow of credit from the banks to industry, agriculture, and business, and on the other hand we are asked to pass this bill which will allow them to expand the currency.

The need for this arises only from the fact that at some time in the future there may be trade balances in favor of foreign countries which will accept gold in settlement of the exchange balances. That is about the only possibility there is that there will be any appreciable depletion of the ten-odd billions of gold which we have stored down in Kentucky. The only possibility, of course, of there being unfavorable trade balances with foreign countries will be due largely to the fact that foreign countries are given encouragement to sell more goods in the United States than we can sell in the foreign countries. This, in turn, brings us around to another academic question concerning the advisability of continuing the policy of the administration concerning reciprocal trade agreements, which I will not discuss. I just want to point out that we should know where we are going with respect to these money matters before we establish a policy.

When once we establish a policy the administration will have no trouble whatsoever in getting the Members on the Republican side of the House to go along with that policy so long as it is sound. One of the reasons why the Republican side of the House has not been privileged to go along with this administration on these monetary policies is that they are so inconsistent that we do not know which policy they are going to accept at any particular time.

For these reasons we use this bill merely as a sounding board to advise you, who do not know what your monetary policies are, that there is such a gross inconsistency in them that even the members of the majority party have not been able to determine what they are. For this reason we may be excused this once for not contributing to these inconsistencies which are creating so much uncertainty in business and industry throughout the Nation today. [Applause.]

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the pro-forma amendment.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 15 minutes.

GOVERNMENT BONDS AS ELIGIBLE PAPER FOR ISSUANCE CURRENCY

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, although I am not in sympathy with the purposes of this bill, I am not opposing it. In the past I have opposed this proposal. Since that time, however, a situation has developed which I believe justifies my vote for the bill. It provides that it shall be effective for only 2 years. If a vote against it would cause a change in the banking system that I believe has caused the only argument in its favor, I would vote that way.

Mr. Speaker, under certain facts and circumstances with which I am acquainted, I am not going to make a speech in opposition to the bill and will vote for it. If this bill provided for a permanent extension, as proposed by a few in authority, I would oppose it in every honorable way that I could oppose it.

RIDICULOUS SITUATION

It seems ridiculous to me that the Government should issue a bond drawing 3 percent interest, sell that bond to a bank, then permit the bank to deposit the bond with the Federal Reserve bank and get its face value in new money by paying the rediscount rate of 1½ or 2 percent and continue to get 3 percent on the bond. Then the Federal Reserve bank by paying the cost of the printing, about 27 cents for every $1,000, may get Federal Reserve notes—new money—on this bond without paying the Government a penny for the use of its credit, which guarantees the money, and will collect from the member bank the rediscount rate of 1½ or 2 percent. Possibly this makes sense to some people, but it does not make sense to me. I am just a new member of the Banking and Currency Committee. Undoubtedly I will learn a lot I do not know, but I am afraid no one will ever be able to explain to me that the Government should pay banks for the use of its own credit.

I am going to take advantage of this opportunity to invite your attention to some very serious inconsistencies in regard to our banking system; that is, what I considered to be inconsistencies.

ORIGINAL INTENTIONS OF FEDERAL RESERVE LAW

In the first place, when the Federal Reserve banks were organized back in 1914—I believe the bill providing for their formation was passed 2 days before Christmas in 1913—it was contemplated that people engaged in agriculture, industry, and commerce would make application to their local banks for credit, give their notes for this credit, the notes to be accepted by the bank, and then that the bank, being a member of a Federal Reserve bank, would be permitted to deposit these notes with the Federal Reserve bank and receive currency or Federal Reserve notes in return for the individual notes given by the customers; and then when the customers paid back their money or Federal Reserve notes it would be returned to the Federal Reserve bank. The customer's notes would be returned to the member banks, the money canceled and the notes canceled. It was a beautiful theory. The law has been substantially changed from its original purposes. This bill carries a substantial change, but only temporary, we hope.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. PATMAN. No; I cannot yield.

Mr. FOCHT. But right there the gentleman is dead wrong.

Mr. PATMAN. If the gentleman says I am wrong, I will certainly yield.

Mr. FOCHT. I am certain the gentleman is wrong, because when the bank presents the individual notes to the Federal Reserve bank it must also give collateral, must it not?

Mr. PATMAN. To take an illustrative case, the bank puts up this note of the gentleman's——

Mr. FOCHT. And collateral.

Mr. PATMAN. Well, the note itself is collateral.

Mr. FOCHT. But the bank must put up additional collateral; must put up bonds.

Mr. PATMAN. The bank puts it up with the Federal Reserve.

Mr. FOCHT. And it also puts up bonds along with the notes.

Mr. PATMAN. Then the Federal Reserve bank, not the gentleman's local bank, takes the gentleman's note—we will say it is for $1,000—and deposits it with the Federal Reserve bank's agent, together with 40 percent gold which the bank has, and in that way the gentleman's bank will obtain from the Federal Reserve bank of his district $1,000 in currency or Federal Reserve notes.

Mr. FOCHT. The gentleman forgot about that 40 percent gold, did he not?

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman did not give me a chance to finish. Had he permitted, I would have spoken of it. The gentleman seemed to have the mistaken idea that his bank would put up 40 percent gold with his note to the Federal Reserve bank. I am sorry the gentleman interrupted me, but he said I was wrong. He found out, however, that I was not wrong.

Mr. FOCHT. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

BANKS HAVE BECOME COMMERCIAL BOOKKEEPERS AND SPECULATORS IN GOVERNMENT BONDS

Mr. PATMAN. In that way money is acquired from the Federal Reserve banks. That was a beautiful theory, it was very elastic, but in recent years the banks have been getting into a different kind of business. This law that was so good in the beginning had had many so-called perfecting amendments. The banks have been getting into the business of speculating in Government bonds, and in order to make more money for themselves they have been making service charges to their customers. Many of them have become commercial bookkeepers and bond speculators. They have been getting out of the banking business. I am now referring to local banks and not to the 12 Federal Reserve banks.

WILL THIS BILL ENCOURAGE BANKS TO STAY OUT OF REAL BANKING FUNCTIONS

The principal objection I have to the pending bill is that it looks to me like an encouragement to the banks to stay in this business rather than to get back into the business for which they were originally formed. According to this bill a bank may put up Government bonds instead of eligible paper such as was originally intended; instead of putting up the paper of agriculturists, the industrialists, or the merchants they just put up Government bonds and get money. This was all right during an emergency and we are not entirely free from an emergency even now.

Let us see what the effect of it is. Today the 14,000 banks of this Nation have approximately eighteen billions in Government securities.

ONE HUNDRED AND NINE BANKS REPRESENT 50 PERCENT CAPITAL OF ALL BANKS

There are 109 banks in this country that own 67 percent of all the bonds that all the banks hold. They have 50.1 percent of the capital stock of all 14,120 banks and 56.2 percent of the assets. It occurs to me that this policy has led to a situation where the banks cannot afford to get back into the banking business.

CAN BANKS AFFORD TO MAKE LOANS?

I wonder if they want to get back to furnishing industrial loans or loans for commerce and agriculture and make money easy and create new loans with interest rates increasing, as they will. If the banks were to do that and the interest rates were to increase, which they would, what effect would that have upon their principal asset, the $18,000,000,000 in Government bonds? These bonds bear an average interest rate of 2.2. This increase in interest rates caused by easier money would cause those bonds to decrease in value.

EFFECT OF BOND DECREASE

Let us see what effect that would have upon the 14,120 banks. Although the banks hold $18,000,000,000 which are invested in Government securities, including $2,430,000,000 held by the 12 Federal Reserve banks, all the capital stock, surplus, and undivided profits of all the banks in this Nation only aggregate $7,000,000,000. Therefore the bonds would not have to depreciate a great deal in value until it would wipe out a substantial part of that $7,000,000,000. It seems to me instead of passing legislation of this kind we should pass a bill that would be more substantial and one which would get to the root of the problem. Obviously we cannot do that now so we will submit to the passage of this one. I am afraid this is in the direction of creating an incentive in the minds of the bankers to stay in this bond-speculating business and not get back into the banking business.

WHAT WILL BE OUTCOME?

I confess I do not know what is going to be the outcome. I hope the people in charge have a goal toward which they are steering a straight course, and one that will solve the situation, but it does look very unusual to me that the House and Senate would permit a situation to develop in which the banks could not afford to get out and engage in the banking business for fear it would destroy or depreciate the value of their principal asset, that is, $18,000,000,000 in Government bonds. If the Social Security reserve fund was large enough to buy the $18,000,000,000 in bonds held by these banks, the problem would be solved. Then interest would be paid by the Government on the bonds but it would go to our aged people and not to these banks. The bonds would be tax exempt as they are now but no one would object because the Government and the aged would be getting the benefit of such exemption. The banks would have the money now invested in bonds to extend loans to agriculture, commerce, and industry without fearing the depreciation of the value of Government bonds as they are now. This could not be done quickly but could be done gradually. If the Government owned the Federal Reserve banks, they could buy these Government bonds from the 14,120 banks and give them credit for them. Then the Government would not be compelled to pay interest on its own obligations. This could be done gradually, not quickly, without upsetting our banking system.

The Republican leadership has already commenced a campaign to change the Social Security reserve fund. They want the Government to pay interest to the banks instead of paying it to the fund for the aged.

The 109 large banks and the large insurance companies are going to put up a stiff fight to change that reserve-fund requirement in the Social Security law.

Mr. BIERMANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BIERMANN. Can the gentleman tell us how much of these Government securities have been put up by the Federal Reserve banks as security for note issues?

Mr. PATMAN. Only a very small, insignificant amount. I am glad the gentleman mentioned that.

ENORMOUS BUSINESS OF 12 FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS

There are 12 Federal Reserve banks, as the gentleman knows. Originally it was intended that all member banks should invest 6 percent of their capital and surplus in capital stock in the Federal Reserve banks; but they have never invested 6 percent. They have only paid in 3 percent; that is all they have been requested to pay, which aggregates only about $140,000,000. This is stated for information and not in criticism.

With that $140,000,000 these 12 Federal Reserve banks are doing a business totaling sometimes two or three hundred billion dollars a year. Obviously it is not the small amount that the banks paid in which permitted these 12 Federal Reserve banks to operate on such a large scale. It is the Government credit that permits them to operate on such a large scale.

Here is the way it works. If the 12 Federal Reserve banks buy bonds, they buy the bonds with the Government's own credit. That is what they buy them with. They hold $2,430,000,000 worth of them already, and instead of canceling the bonds, as should be done when bonds are purchased with the Government's credit, these bonds are held in the vaults of these 12 banks, and the Government continues to pay interest on them as though they had not been bought with the Government's own credit. I have introduced a bill providing that the Government shall take over and operate these 12 Federal Reserve banks since they are operated principally on the Government credit and pay the member banks the $140,000,000 stock investment they have in them.

THREE BIG CONCESSIONS MADE BY HOUSE TO GET FEDERAL DEPOSIT INSURANCE

When this law was passed in 1913, there was contained in it section 16 relating to eligible paper and the issuance of Federal Reserve notes. I hope you gentlemen will get a copy of the hearings held before the committee on February 16 and 18, 1937. I think you will find some interesting information in these hearings. Governor Eccles, of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve Board, testified. He was questioned for several hours and I know the Members will get some interesting information from these printed hearings which are available.

When these 12 Federal Reserve banks were organized it was contemplated that after the expenses were paid and a 6-percent dividend paid to the member banks for the amount that was put up as capital stock, the remainder would go into the Treasury of the United States. This surplus or excess earnings went to pay for the franchise, so-called. In other words, it would pay the Government something for the use of its own credit.

May I commend the chairman of the committee for his efforts in the direction of getting a Federal deposit-insurance law passed in 1933. That bill was first sponsored in the House, and it was passed by this House. In order for him to get the bill enacted into law, when it went over to the other body and a different bill passed which forced a conference, he had to make three big concessions. One provided that hereafter the local or individual banks shall not be required to pay interest on demand deposits. Not a penny interest was to be paid on demand deposits; made it a violation of the law to contract for such interest payment. Another was that the Board could regulate the interest paid by local banks on time deposits. The third was that the excess earnings of the 12 Federal Reserve banks would not go into the Treasury as intended, but would go into the surplus of the Federal Reserve banks themselves. Those three great concessions were made.

POSSIBLY OVER HALF A BILLION DOLLARS SAVED ANNUALLY

Let me tell you what they amount to. On demand deposits, Governor Eccles' testimony, together with tables I have inserted, will disclose that the 7,000 member banks of the Federal Reserve System, one-half of all banks, have possibly been saving about $300,000,000 a year since 1933 on that one concession; that is, on demand deposits. They have possibly been saving $200,000,000 a year on the concession involving time deposits, because the interest rate has been reduced and the excess-earnings law involving the 12 Federal Reserve banks changed so that all profits when made will go into the surplus fund of each bank instead of into the Treasury as part payment for the use of this valuable franchise. I insert herewith a statement prepared for me by the Federal Reserve Board relating to interest payments before the 1933 law and since. I realize that possibly the amounts would have been reduced anyway. However, it should be realized that these savings, or possible savings, were for 7,000 member banks only, or about one-half the number of banks in the Nation, although they represent the largest banks in the Nation.

Mr. BIERMANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. BIERMANN. Is it not a fact the law prevents stock in Federal Reserve banks paying more than 6 percent, and is it not a further fact whenever these banks are liquidated every bit of the surplus or undivided profits goes into the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. PATMAN. I am of the opinion, for reasons I shall express at another time, that the law preventing interest being paid on demand deposits substantially helps big banks and substantially harms little banks.

It is not contemplated by anyone that they will be liquidated. I hope the gentleman will not insist on diverting me to what I consider a minor matter compared with a matter of much greater importance at this time, in view of my own limited time.

Mr. BIERMANN. The gentleman's time has not been greatly limited. The gentleman has had three times as much as the usual time allowed, and when the gentleman casts out the idea that by these arrangements which have been made recently——

Mr. PATMAN. No; I made it plain that this was in 1914.

Mr. BIERMANN. Whereas the law has always limited them to 6 percent and up until the act of 1932 half of their profits went to the Treasury of the United States, and in 1933 they gave to the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation $150,000,000, or thereabouts; is not that correct?

Mr. PATMAN. I have not checked the gentleman's figures, but I know that 6 percent is the amount the banks received, and I know we appropriated approximately the amount stated by the gentleman from the fund stated for the purpose stated. They certainly would not ask for more than 6 percent, and all above 6 percent goes back to the surplus fund of the bank which they own under the new law. So certainly they are getting it all and not just 6 percent. At the proper time an effort will probably be made to distribute these earnings among the member banks. The earnings go to their own bank because the Federal Reserve banks, my dear sir, are not owned by the Government.

Mr. BIERMANN. I am just as well aware of that fact as is the gentleman.

FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS SUPERCORPORATION OWNED BY OTHER CORPORATIONS

Mr. PATMAN. The Federal Reserve banks are owned by 7,000 private banks of the country. The Government does not own one penny of stock in them. It could do so, but it never has. No individual owns a penny of stock in the Federal Reserve banks. All of the 12 Federal Reserve banks are owned by other banks. It is a supercorporation owned by other corporations.

Mr. BIERMANN. That is correct, and the dividend on the stock is limited to 6 percent, and has never gone under 6 percent in the history of the banks.

Mr. PATMAN. If not earned, it is paid out of surplus. I hope the gentleman will not insist on diverting me further.

HOW MONEY ISSUED ON GOVERNMENT BONDS

Under the original law, if a bank, for instance, here in Washington wants $1,000,000, it will deliver, or it used to deliver, $1,000,000 of eligible paper to the Federal Reserve bank in this district, which is at Richmond, Va., and the Richmond Federal Reserve Bank would let the local bank have that $1,000,000. Now, the Federal Reserve bank in Richmond, in order to get the money, would, of course, deposit the collateral with the Federal Reserve agent there, and then get the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to print the Federal Reserve notes or currency in order to let the local bank here have the $1,000,000.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

Mr. BIERMANN and Mr. BLAND rose.

Mr. BIERMANN. If the gentleman will agree to yield for a few questions before he concludes, I will have no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon that. Of course, the gentleman can object.

Mr. BIERMANN. As the gentleman goes along, if he will submit to some questioning when he makes some preposterous statement——

Mr. PATMAN. I do not agree with the gentleman that I have been making preposterous statements. If the gentleman can show me that I am making such statements, I shall be very pleased to yield at any time, but the gentleman cannot do that.

Mr. BIERMANN. As I recall, the gentleman made the statement that the banks buy Government bonds with Government credit. That is a preposterous statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas to proceed for 5 additional minutes?

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I am not going to object to this request for 5 minutes, but I wish to remind the gentleman and the House that many committees are here awaiting the call of the calendar. I have an emergency matter to bring up today. Tomorrow, I believe, is to be "talk" day, and we had hoped to be able to proceed with other business today.

Mr. PATMAN. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion, and if granted this request will not take up any further time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I hope the gentleman will ask me a question on this particular point.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes. In the gentleman's analysis, has he drawn any relationship between the amount the banks have earned through its interest item which you quoted a minute ago of over $300,000,000 and the amount that the demand deposits would have earned on daily balances at the going rate of interest which prevailed under the old set-up?

LAW NOT BEING CARRIED OUT

Mr. PATMAN. I will ask the gentleman to refer to the hearings, where he will find information on that matter.

The point I am making is that under the law as originally contemplated, if the Federal bank at Richmond wanted to let the bank here have that $1,000,000, it would charge this bank a rediscount rate. That is the present law, and I do not object to it. That rate is now 2 percent at all Federal Reserve banks, except New York and Cleveland; it is 1½ percent at these banks. However, when the Federal Reserve banks gets the money issued to itself, it does not pay the Government a penny. That is what I do object to. The law says:

But to the extent such application—

Meaning application for Federal Reserve notes or currency—may be granted by the Federal Reserve Board, it shall, through its local reserve agent, supply Federal Reserve notes to the bank so applying, and such bank—

Listen to this—and such bank shall be charged with the amount of such notes—

Meaning Federal Reserve notes or currency—and shall pay such rate of interest on said amount as may be established by the Federal Reserve Board.

This is very plain. This is still the law. When the Government's credit is used the Federal Reserve bank that is using that credit shall pay, according to law now in effect, a certain rate of interest for its use. This rate of interest to be fixed by the Federal Reserve Board, but the Federal Reserve Board said in 1914 or 1915, substantially, "we will fix a zero rate of interest for the reason that all the surplus earnings of the 12 Federal Reserve banks go into the Treasury of the United States anyway, and there is no reason why we should fix any rate of interest, since the excess goes into the Treasury." This was very reasonable; it sounded good. It was possibly good reasoning and perfectly logical until Mr. STEAGALL's bill went over to the Senate and they forced him to agree, in order to get the guarantee of bank deposits, that all excess earnings would go to the Federal Reserve banks themselves. This changed that law, and therefore, since the excess earnings do not go to the Government, why should not this provision of the law, which is still the law, be carried out? And when these Government bonds are placed on deposit and Federal Reserve notes, currency, issued in return for them, I just wonder why the Federal Reserve Board, or the Board of Governors as now established, does not require them to pay the interest rates that the law says they should pay.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. Assuming a bank owns $10,000,000 worth of Government bonds at the present time. Under this bill those bonds would be eligible as collateral for the issuance of Federal Reserve notes or currency.

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. And there would be a small service charge made. Is that right?

Mr. PATMAN. The rediscount rate would be paid, in New York 1½ percent and here 2 percent.

Mr. McCORMACK. In other words if $10,000,000 worth of Government bonds were deposited, and approximately $10,000,000 of Federal Reserve notes obtained, would the member bank pay the 2 percent in the various districts?

Mr. PATMAN. It would.

Mr. McCORMACK. For Federal Reserve notes that have been received?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. They would receive the interest on the bonds?

Mr. PATMAN. That is true, and then the Federal Reserve bank would not have to pay anything for the issuance of notes, save the cost of printing, which is 27 cents a thousand.

Mr. McCORMACK. If the bonds are carrying 2½ percent interest, and this transaction took place in a discount district where the rate of discount is 2 percent, the member bank would be charged the 2 percent by the Federal Reserve bank and would obtain the 2½ percent interest from the Government.

Mr. PATMAN. That is true, but only a small amount is handled in that way.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to insert therein a list of the 109 banks representing 50 percent of the capital stock of all of the 14,000 banks, to show the percentage of Government securities held by those banks, compared with the Government securities held by the others, and other information in connection therewith and in explanation of my remarks. The following information concerning the 109 banks representing 50.1 percent of the capital stock of all the 14,120 banks was furnished me by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation at my request.

BRANCH BANKING

Gov. M. S. Eccles, Chairman of the Federal Reserve System, appeared before the Banking and Currency Committee in support of this bill. I interrogated him, in addition to other subjects, regarding his views on branch banking. A part of the testimony is as follows:

Mr. PATMAN. You have answered the question I asked. But I would like to ask another question. I know the time is getting late, but, as I said, we are interested in the direction you are going in this legislation and in similar legislation, and personally I would like to know about that. Perhaps all the other members of the committee know about it, but I am a new member on this committee. I would like to know how you feel about branch banking. Are you working in the direction of eventually having a branch-banking system in this country?

Mr. ECCLES. If you are speaking about any work that the Board has been doing, the matter has not been discussed, nor has it been mentioned. So far as I personally am concerned, I have done nothing, that is, I have done no work whatever, I have given no thought to the subject, and I have prepared no legislation, and I have not requested that any legislation be prepared with reference to the subject, in spite of the statements of some of the press and the bankers. So far as my position on branch banking is concerned, my position is well known. I stated my position before this committee 2 years ago and I still feel as strongly as I felt 2 years ago that a limited branch-bank development in this country is not only desirable in the public interest, as well as in the interest of the little bank, but it is inevitable.

Mr. PATMAN. I have here a list of the 109 largest banks in the United States, which I understand represent more than 50 percent of the total assets of all banks, and the amount of Government securities they hold and their deposits of interbank deposits. And one thing is very noticeable to me on this list. For instance, take the first three banks, which are New York banks, with assets of $2,356,000,000 for the first one, and the second one with total assets of $1,972,869,000, and the next one with total assets of $1,969,852,000. And all of these banks have interbank deposits. We find the Bank of America at San Francisco has total assets of $1,366,000,000.

The Bank of America at San Francisco has total assets of $1,366,000,000, but it has only $39,584,000 of interbank deposits. Then going down the list there is $254,122,000 interbank deposits for a smaller bank, and then $278,969,000, $170,966,000, and $228,991,000. It is noticeable that the larger banks have a large amount in interbank deposits except in the case of banks where there are branches. For instance, take the Los Angeles bank, the Security First National Bank of Los Angeles, and, although the bank compares in size with those just ahead of it, they have only $25,845,000 in interbank deposits. The one just ahead of it on the list has $106,000,000 in interbank deposits.

The First National Bank of New York is smaller, yet it has $158,000,000 in interbank deposits.

I have reached the conclusion, whether it is well founded or not—and I hope the Governor will tell me whether it is—that where they have branch banks, like they do in California, that they want to do business only with their own banks, and consequently they do not have many large interbank deposit accounts.

For instance, take Los Angeles and San Francisco; if there were a bank needed in a town the large bank in San Francisco or in Los Angeles would have the first claim on it, because an independent bank would not be very successful unless it had a connection with one of these larger banks. Therefore I have reached the conclusion from analyzing these figures, Governor, that branch banking has a tendency of concentrating the credit system of the country in a few hands, and that if we were to adopt a policy which led to branch banking that we would concentrate more power and wealth in the hands of a few. I presume the Governor may entertain an entirely different view than that.

Mr. ECCLES. Of course, this branch-banking question, I realize, is a very debatable question; and it has been for a long period of time. In other words, it is a hot subject. And for me to attempt to enter into a discussion with you, considering its advantages and its disadvantages——

Mr. PATMAN. I am not asking you to discuss it, Governor.

Mr. ECCLES. I realize that there are always two sides to every question. But no one is more sympathetic to the place that the little bank has been in the community than I am. And no one would be more unwilling than I would be to do anything to put that little bank out of business so long as it is giving the best service to its community. I would not want to be understood as favoring branch banking that permitted the establishment of branches in any community that already had banking service.

Mr. PATMAN. But, Governor, if you permit it, and then if your larger bank will not become the correspondent of the smaller bank in a little town, the bank will eventually dry up if it cannot get the service, and if the branch-banking concern does not want to serve it, it can destroy the little bank and in that way create a demand for one of their own branches, can it not?

Mr. ECCLES. Any unit bank can get far more service from the Federal Reserve System than from a correspondent bank.

Mr. PATMAN. But suppose it is not in the Federal Reserve?

Mr. ECCLES. Then it should join the Federal Reserve. I am also in favor of unification. Of course, there is the place where they should carry their balances. It is where the reserves should be kept, because the only place where a member of the System should keep his balance is with the Reserve bank.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD and to incorporate therein the matter he has indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last two words. When I heard Senator Aldridge in 1913, in the Senate, read the report on the Federal Reserve bank, the impression was clearly left with me, and I am sure with the country, that we were going to have a revolution in the matter of loans to businessmen, that there was to be a wide extension of credit and a flexibility that would enable businessmen to deposit with the banks commercial paper, and get credit for that much cash. This commercial paper was to be translated into cash, and the cash used in business at a rate of interest, I think of 5½ percent at that time. The bill itself became a law under President Wilson. It was mutually agreed, it was a nonpartisan proposal, in order to extend and expand business, and that is the reason I inquired of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] when he was hurriedly going over this matter and telling us with what facility you could get this money—by taking a businessman's note and depositing it with the Federal Reserve and getting the cash, which is something that you cannot do at all. That was a delusion and a deception. A change was made in that bill—or at least something happened to it after it was reported—and the result is, and I know it by practical experience, that when you try to get some money you cannot get it, unless you have collateral in the form of bonds, stocks, mortgages, or endorsements. That is all I wanted to say about this, excepting that there is nothing more complicated in the world, except possibly what you have to go through with your income tax than you have to go through with these finances, and my sympathies are much with the able gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL], and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH], because they are endeavoring to illuminate something that has been going on for 25 years, and I doubt whether many bankers or officials know any more about the Federal Reserve System than we did when Mr Aldridge read that report.

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KITCHENS: Page 2, line 19, after the word "notes", insert "Provided further, That upon approval of this act all interest on United States bonds deposited with the Treasurer of the United States and against which currency has been or may be issued shall cease so long as held as such collateral."

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state the point of order.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, this bill has to do with the issuance of Federal Reserve notes and the collateral for those notes. The gentleman's amendment has to do with interest on direct obligations of the Federal Government and has nothing whatsoever to do with the issuance of Federal Reserve notes or the collateral thereunder. For that reason I submit that the amendment offered by the gentleman is not germane.

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his point of order until I make a statement?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Speaker, during the past few years I have heard a great deal of discussion regarding the policy of this Government in reference to the handling of its financial system through the bankers of the country. I know that as far back as this country's history goes we have had panics and depressions, if you please, about every 7 years.

Immediately after the Civil War we had a panic, which was about 1866. In 1873 we had another panic. In 1880 we had another panic. In 1886 and 1887 we had another panic. In 1893 we had another one. In 1900 we had another one. In 1907 we had another one. In 1914 we had another one. In 1920 and 1921 we had another one, and since 1929 we have had one which has lasted for about 7 years.

So I blame the troubles of this country upon the economic and the financial system of America. It has been under the control of the bankers of this country.

Now, this is the only way, it seems to me, this Government can put out money to the country. It is in their hands to control. They can make it scarce or they can make it plentiful, according to how they judge the situation. You know, and I know, that the Federal Reserve System is made up of the private banks of this country, as the gentleman from Michigan admitted a while ago, and as the gentleman from Texas stated. They are owned by private individuals of this country. They can take as much as $14,000,000,000, if they have that many bonds in their vaults today, walk to the Treasury of the United States, place those bonds on a table there, and demand of the Treasurer of the United States to print over there for nothing $14,000,000,000 worth of notes—currency—bring them back there, and turn them over to the bankers. And do the bankers pay one penny of interest for that $14,000,000,000 of currency? Not one penny in the world and at the same time they draw the interest on those bonds under the bankers' act, the National Bank Act of 1874, until the present time.

Today there are $87,000,000 worth of bonds in the Treasury of the United States bearing up to 3⅜-percent interest, and the Treasury of the United States—the people of the United States, if you please—have issued currency to the Federal Reserve banks and they pay no interest, and yet the people of the United States have to pay that 3⅜-percent interest on those bonds, amounting to about $2,500,000.

I see no reason for having a policy like this. If it is absolutely necessary that we handle the currency of this country through the bankers, I see no reason why they should be permitted to get currency for nothing and at the same time draw this interest on the bonds used as collateral with which to get the currency. This is just the same as if I should go to you and borrow $1,000 and give you my note for the $1,000 bearing 3-percent interest, and then you take my note, come back to me and borrow $1,000 from me. I pay you interest on the note, but you do not pay me any interest on the $1,000 that you get from me.

I may not understand this situation. I am a young Member of this House. I want to learn, and therefore I have introduced this amendment to find out a little something about the situation, because I have seen this in the papers and I have heard it discussed all over this country. I am here to learn, and if it is necessary to change the policy of this Government, I stand ready to change it, because I am opposed to a panic or a depression that robs the people of this country and puts them in poverty and causes more suffering than all the wars of the world, and we have them every 7 years, and it is up to the Congress of the United States to devise some policy that will prevent such outrages upon the great American people. We have the greatest people in the world, yet we stand here or we come to Congress and permit such an outrage as this upon this great country of ours. [Applause.]

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against this amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DRIVER). The point of order is sustained.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, much has been said here that I do not desire to undertake to review or to answer at this time. But for the RECORD I do want to call attention to the fact that in December 1936 we had Federal Reserve notes outstanding amounting to $4,497,999,000, and against these notes there were pledged as collateral only $88,000,000 of United States obligations, and at that time only a nominal amount of eligible paper. Against these notes were pledged nearly 100 percent of gold certificates. It will be seen that we are in a most unusual situation, a condition that no experience in our history would justify us in assuming will long continue. In this situation any considerable withdrawal of gold, in the absence of eligible paper, would disclose difficulties similar to those that existed at the time of the passage of the original act in 1932. We have an abnormal situation which nobody could expect to continue indefinitely. We do not wish a repetition of embarrassments such as confronted us in 1931 and 1932.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WOODRUFF) there were—ayes 67, noes 23.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is not a quorum present and object to the vote on that ground.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 280, nays 104, not voting 48, as follows:

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks upon the construction of the Federal building at Orlando, Fla.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by placing in the Appendix an article upon silver by a former Director of the United States Mint, George P. Roberts, who is now vice president of the National City Bank.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. In the absence of the Republican member of the Committee on Printing, who is objecting to that sort of extension, I object.

CALL OF COMMITTEES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will call the committees.

OPERATOR LICENSES, RADIO STATIONS

Mr. LEA (when the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was called). Mr. Speaker, by authority of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I call up the bill (H. R. 3898) to amend section 318 of the Communications Act of 1934, and ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California calls up the bill H. R. 3898 and asks unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 318 of the Communications Act of 1934 is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 318. The actual operation of all transmitting apparatus in any radio station for which a station license is required by this act shall be carried on only by a person holding an operator's license issued hereunder, and no person shall operate any such apparatus in such station except under and in accordance with an operator's license issued to him by the Commission: Provided, however, That the Commission may waive or modify the foregoing provisions of this section for the operation of any station except (1) stations for which licensed operators are required by international agreement, (2) stations for which licensed operators are required for safety purposes, (3) stations engaged in broadcasting, and (4) stations operated as common carriers on frequencies below 30,000 kilocycles.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 3, after the word "Commission", insert "if it shall find that the public interest, convenience, or necessity will be served thereby", and on page 2, line 11, after the word "kilocycles", strike out the period, insert a colon and the following: "Provided further, That the Commission shall have power to make special regulations governing the granting of licenses for the use of automatic radio devices and for the operation of such devices."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I think there should be some explanation of the bill before it is passed.

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COLE] reported the bill, and I yield to him.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. The purpose of this bill, stated briefly, is this: Under existing law, that is, section 318 of the Communications Act, the transmitting apparatus must be under the control of a licensed operator at all times. The Communications Commission having found that the language of the existing law when applied was entirely too strict, recommended the changes incorporated in this bill, thereby vesting in the Commission certain descretion which it does not have at this time.

There are several reasons for this legislation, the first and most convincing being the situation at the Cruft Labratory at Harvard University. Harvard University was permitted a license for a general experimental station and for several years operated under that license, making continuous observations of the ionosphere. The licensee, being Harvard University in this case, felt that it could not afford to keep a licensed operator on duty throughout the continuous operation but because of the absolute requirements of section 318, no waiver of that requirement could be made by the Communications Commission. Consequently, this valuable collaboration between Harvard University and the Commission and the tremendous value being derived therefrom had to be discontinued. Another reason is the possibility of using automatic transmitters on police cars which will be valuable in this emergency field. At present, a central operation but because of the absolute requirement of section licensed operators. It is felt with this new provision in the law, radio beacons could be operated automatically at stations too remote and too expensive to operate under existing law.

A letter from the Communications Commission to me dated February 19, 1937, expresses very fully and in a most convincing way the controlling reason for our committee reporting this bill.

I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and incorporate therein this letter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., February 19, 1937.

Hon. WM. P. COLE, Jr.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN COLE: In respect to your request by telephone for a statement of the considerations which the Commission had in mind in proposing an amendment to section 318 of the Communications Act of 1934, which amendment is embodied in H. R. 3898 in the form in which it was originally introduced at this session, I beg to report as follows:

This amendment is designed to give the Commission discretion in certain instances to relax the absolute requirement of section 318 that all transmitting apparatus at all times of operation must be under the control of a licensed operator.

The need for such discretion was brought to the attention of the Commission forcibly by an application of the Cruft Laboratory, Harvard University. A general experimental station had been licensed to that institution for several years for the purpose of making continuous observations of the ionosphere. The value of this research depended on continuous operation of the station. The results of the operation were recorded automatically. There was no function which an operator could have performed in this connection other than to keep the station upon its proper frequency. The Cruft Laboratory, in consultation with the Engineering Department of the Commission, worked out an automatic device capable of preventing improper operation of the station. The licensee felt that it could not afford to keep an operator on duty throughout continuous operation and regarded such a requirement as unreasonable in view of the fact that no useful function could be performed by the operator. However, the absolute requirement of section 318 prohibited such operation. Consequently, this important piece of research had to be discontinued. This is but one of a number of instances in which the actual operation of a station by a licensed operator is impractical and unnecessary from an engineering viewpoint. Useful scientific research is inhibited by the present rigid requirement of section 318. Free balloons containing small automatic transmitters are useful in obtaining reports and in recording atmospheric conditions at great altitudes.

The use of automatic transmitters on police cars controlled by a central operator would be of value in this important field of emergency service. It would obviate the existing necessity of requiring that police driving such cars be also licensed operators. Since these stations operate only on the ultra-high frequencies, there is little danger of interference from such operation.

The development of radio to promote the safety of life and property in the air is also handicapped. Without such a requirement, radio beacons could be operated automatically at remote points where the attendance of an operator would be impractical both from a physical and a financial standpoint.

It is important to remember that control by the Commission over a station is not lost because it is automatically operated. The control over the license of the licensee remains to insure proper operation.

It should be noted that the amendment suggested by the Commission excluded four classes of stations from the field of discretion of the Commission. These exceptions were carefully designed to avoid conflict with international agreements, to preserve safety, and to exclude stations operating with great power or on frequencies where considerable interference might be expected. It may be that the bill as amended before being reported out of committee confers somewhat greater discretion upon the Commission. However, the Commission believes that it can, in the exercise of its discretion, avoid any relaxation of the operator requirements where such relaxation would not be in the public interest.

Sincerely yours,

IRVIN STEWART, Commissioner.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was, on motion of Mr. LEA, laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Has the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce any further bills?

Mr. LEA. The committee has no further bills this afternoon, Mr. Speaker.

CALL OF COMMITTEES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will call the committees.

AMENDMENT OF MERCHANT MARINE ACT OF 1936

Mr. BLAND (when the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries was called). Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 4951) to amend section 704 of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 (49 Stat. L., 2008–2009).

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if this request be granted, what will be the situation with reference to amendments to the bill?

Mr. BLAND. Amendments will be in order. My understanding is that the effect of this request is to eliminate general debate, that the bill is read under the 5-minute rule. As a matter of fact, when the bill is read I shall move to strike out the last word in order to make a statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair advises the gentleman from Iowa that the bill will be read under the 5-minute rule.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 704 of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 (49 U. S. Stat. L. 2008–2009) be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 704. All vessels transferred to or otherwise acquired by the Commission in any manner may be chartered or sold by the Commission pursuant to the further provisions of this act. All vessels transferred to the Commission by this act and now being operated by private operators on lines in foreign commerce of the United States shall be temporarily operated by the Commission for its account by private operators until such time and upon such operating agreements as the Commission may deem advantageous, preference to be given to present operators, and all operation of the Commission's vessels by private operators under such operating agreements shall be discontinued as soon as practicable after December 31, 1937: Provided, That nothing contained herein shall be construed as limiting or affecting the power of sale under provisions of section 705 of this act."

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Speaker, it will be recalled that when the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 was passed there was no opportunity to go to conference, for it was during the closing hours of the session.

There was inserted in the Senate, and it first appeared by amendment on May 4, 1936, this section which we are seeking to amend, section 704. The pertinent portion as applicable to the situation before us deals with the operation of certain Government-owned lines that were operated by the Government and have been operated by the Government for many years. This section as originally passed provided that the Commission might continue the operation under agreements to be entered into with the operating managers and then provided that the operation should be discontinued within 1 year after the passage of the act. The act became a law on June 29, 1936. Five lines had been in existence for many years operating Government ships. Some of them had tried to get ocean-mail contracts, but because of certain questions that arose—not with respect to these particular lines—they had been unable to do so. These lines are the America Pioneer Lines, which run to Australia and the Far East; the America-France Line, which runs from Hampton Roads and North Atlantic ports, Philadelphia, Boston, and New York to French ports; the American Hampton Roads Line-Yankee Line, which runs from the same ports to east ports of the United Kingdom; the Oriole Line, which runs from North Atlantic ports of the United States to west ports of the United Kingdom; and the American Republics Line, which runs to South America.

The act provided that the operation of these lines should be discontinued within 1 year from the passage of the act. Under section 704, as it was written, therefore, the operation of these lines would have to be discontinued as of June 29, 1937. Another question then arose, however, as to whether they could be operated up to June 29, 1937, for the reason that payments were made by the Government for the operation of the lines under the present operating agreement, based on a percentage of the net revenue.

The question was submitted to the Comptroller General, and the Comptroller General ruled that the operation must be discontinued by June 29, 1937. That resolved itself into this situation, that the lines running to the Far East take 120 days per trip. The last date on which a ship of those lines could sail would be March 3 of this year. Thereafter no ships would be permitted to run on that particular line, or if they did, no compensation would be paid them after June 29; and so with varying dates as to other lines. The effect of the ruling of the Comptroller General was to cut down the year that had been provided by Congress for the operation of these ships, as illustrated in the case of this particular line which could not make any sailings after March 3.

The Commission realizing, as it did, that these Government-owned lines should not be discontinued at this time, advertised them for a bare-boat charter. These bids are returnable on March 1.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLAND. The situation is that these bids will come in on March 1, and with respect to one particular line something would have to be done by March 3. The committee, after careful investigation, after full hearings, are convinced that it was the intent of Congress to provide the original year and that there would be grave danger in the disruption of these services and great injury to the merchant marine unless the time were extended as herein provided. Provision is also made in the pending bill that the lines may be continued upon operating agreements agreeable to the Commission. The Commission is studying the essentiality of the services. It is also studying other important matters as to which it has reached no conclusion. In the opinion of the committee, it is important to arrive at a conclusion or definite policy before these lines are disrupted.

Mr. Speaker, I also call attention to the fact the original intent was 1 year within which it should continue to study this act. The bill was passed on June 29, 1936. The present temporary Commission was not appointed until September 1936. I am not criticizing, but simply bring the facts to the attention of the House. The permanent Commission that was contemplated by the act has not been appointed. A temporary Commission has been appointed under recess appointment, consisting of three men, two naval officers and one a gentleman who has been connected with the Treasury Department.

I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. I was going to ask the gentleman a question in connection with that matter, but he has covered it to some extent. However, I would like to ask him whether or not the situation with reference to the temporary Commission has had an effect upon the delay which brought about the emergency which the gentleman has so properly called the attention of the Members of the House to?

Mr. BLAND. Unquestionably there was a delay until September in connection with the appointment and no study could be made by a commission in that time.

Mr. McCORMACK. And unless this bill is passed between now and March 3 there will be irreparable damage done that the Congress never intended?

Mr. BLAND. Yes; the committee thinks so. Another thing is that two established lines that have been in operation since 1928 were consolidated, one of those operators being in New York and the other in the Hampton Roads ports.

Mr. Speaker, the committee is of the opinion there should be a definite policy set up; and if these charters were made now, there would be grave danger that a monopoly might be created in the North Atlantic by having some of those who hold ocean-mail contracts come in with their charter bids and thus oust these people who have been building up a business since 1918 in one case and 1929 in another case. It is to the interest of the American merchant marine that these people shall know what they are bidding on when they do bid and that a definite policy shall have been worked out. We believe that policy ought to be worked out by a permanent commission.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to amend section 705 of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 by extending the time from 1 year, as provided in the bill, to approximately 18 months, or, to be exact, from June 29 to December 31 of this year, within which to carry out the purposes of the act as referred to in this section. This section reads, in part, as follows:

> It shall be the policy of the Commission to encourage the private operation of each essential steamship line now owned by the United States by selling such lines to citizens of the United States in the manner provided in section 7 of the Merchant Marine Act of 1920, and in strict accordance with the provisions of section 5 of said act or by demising its vessels on bare-boat charters to citizens of the United States who shall agree to maintain such line or lines in the manner hereinafter provided.

Mr. Speaker, this bill was considered very carefully by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries and was reported unanimously by the committee.

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. WEARIN: Strike out all after the word "operators", on page 2, down to the colon in line 6, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "under existing operating agreements until a commission of five members is duly appointed and confirmed by the Senate, and thereafter may be so operated for a period not to exceed 6 months."

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Speaker, I have been very much interested in merchant marine legislation for a long time. I compliment the distinguished chairman of the committee upon which I had the honor to serve until this year upon his excellent statement with reference to this bill. I believe it is generally agreed there is a necessity for some action with reference to this particular matter by virtue of the fact that the time is too limited for the temporary commission to proceed with the negotiations upon this particular matter. Furthermore, I am not so sure in my own mind that the present temporary commission, as constituted, has the authority to function as the maritime authority.

I would like to call attention to the fact that in the original Merchant Marine Act of 1936, which passed this House on June 29, certain principles were laid down. Among them was the outstanding one that the Merchant Marine Authority as appointed by the President and as confirmed by the Senate should have the authority to determine the policy with reference to a merchant marine, and great care was exercised to prevent the injection into that act of any intimation of preference to be granted to any particular group. In this instance, and according to the language of the bill on page 2, it reads, beginning on page 1, line 8:

> All vessels transferred to the Commission by this act and now being operated by private operators on lines in foreign commerce of the United States shall be temporarily operated by the Commission for its account by private operators until such time and upon such operating agreements as the Commission may deem as advantageous, preference to be given to present operators, and all operation of the Commission's vessels by private operators under such operating agreements shall be discontinued as soon as practicable after December 31, 1937.

I do not believe any intimation of preference to any particular group should be injected into the body of the act of 1936, the spirit of which was specifically stated and outlined in the text of the act itself. Furthermore, insofar as the present operators are concerned, it may not prove to mean as much as they think it does.

I would also remind the Members of the fact that under the present language of the bill the operators of the charter lines that belong to the United States Government will continue their operations until December 31, 1937. I do not say that those operators would not be granted that permission by the new maritime authority, but I do believe the Authority's hands should be kept clear of any impediments of that character, with the thought in mind that they can function in accordance with the principles of the act when they come into possession of their rightful authorities by virtue of confirmation on the part of the Senate.

There is an important principle involved in this legislation. I discussed the matter with the honorable chairman of the Merchant Marine Committee, and, in all fairness to him and to his committee, I may say they had an opportunity to consider the amendment that I am offering.

I think these two things are very outstanding: that the matter of preference should not be specifically granted to anyone in this act, and, furthermore, that the hands of the maritime authority, whenever it is appointed, should not be tied but it should be permitted to function in accordance with the principles of the act, and it may be that the policy represented by the particular type of operation that we have here under these chartered lines would not be continued as a permanent policy by the maritime authority.

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEARIN. Now, the question may arise as to what would happen under this amendment to the bill in the event the commission is appointed tomorrow. That proposition would not affect an amended bill any more than it would affect the measure as it is now constituted. Furthermore, if the thought is advanced that the amendment under consideration involves uncertainty for the operators of the chartered lines, I would remind you that the language of the bill, as it is drawn now, does not give them any assurance as to what will happen to them beyond the fact that they are to be given preference, and what does that mean—no one has explained it.

We should by all means, I believe, maintain the spirit and the letter of the law that was enacted in 1936, at least until the maritime authority is appointed. After the authority assumes its duties and responsibilities, as such, it would, under my amendment, have an opportunity to proceed to establish a policy with reference to an American merchant marine immediately, which was obviously, and without doubt, and I say it without fear of any contradiction whatever, intended by the Congress in the original act. Furthermore, it would be able to do so without any limitations whatever, other than those provided in the original statute.

Remember that this language of mine is not offered with the intention of hamstringing this bill or doing the legislation any damage whatsoever, but in actually being of service to the legislation and of service to the American merchant marine, in which I am vitally interested, the same as every Member of the House, even though I represent a district in the interior of the country, because I realize the importance of it.

I also want to remind you that under my amendment, following the appointment of the maritime authority, it would have 6 months in which to complete the establishment of its policy with reference to its chartered lines.

I would remind you also that it would have this 6 months' period regardless of when the authority is appointed. If it is appointed a month from now, it would have 6 months; or if it is not appointed until 6 months from now, it would still have 6 months. This would be a flexible arrangement for the protection of both operators and the Government. Where the present bill fixes the date at December 31 regardless of what happens, my amendment fixes it at 6 months after the appointment of the authority and is sufficiently elastic to permit the set-up to have at least that amount of time within which to act.

This appears to me to be a very fair and reasonable thing to do with this legislation in order to facilitate the operations of the maritime authority whenever it is appointed and confirmed, and I sincerely hope the distinguished chairman of this committee, as well as the committee itself, will subscribe to my earnest efforts to try to improve upon the bill and to assist the maritime authority in the avowed purpose that was set out in the act of 1936, namely, to determine a policy and launch immediately into the business of developing a merchant marine.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Speaker, the speaker certainly, and I believe the entire committee, appreciate the effort of the gentleman from Iowa to improve the bill. I submit the amendment does not. It brings in the very defect that the gentleman is complaining about.

If you will read the original bill which we have introduced, you will realize that we say that the lines shall be operated by private operators upon such agreements as may be made with the Commission. We do not tie the hands of the Commission in the operating agreement that they have made. They have made what is known as the operating agreement of 1935. If our bill is passed and the Commission chooses to change that operating agreement it can do so, whereas under the amendment that is offered by my friend, they could not do so because it is the express mandate of Congress that they shall continue under existing operating agreements. The language "existing operating agreements" makes it more nearly certain that the present operators would continue than the bill as originally introduced and as reported by the committee. We say that the Commission shall operate upon an agreement that is satisfactory to the Commission or within the discretion of the Commission. If the Commission chooses within this period to change that operating agreement, then the present operators would be given a preference, but they would not absolutely have the right to get the agreement, whereas the amendment that is offered by my friend says, "Under existing operating agreements until a Commission of five members is appointed."

Suppose it should be the wisdom of the Commission that the present operating agreement is not a satisfactory one, and that another operating agreement more to the interest of the Government should be made. The Commission would have the right under the bill we presented to make a new operating agreement and then to say to the Roosevelt Steamship Co., to the Cosmopolitan Steamship Co., to any of the present operators, "Will you accept this?" They will give such operator the preference, because they have established contacts, they have agencies getting business throughout the country, they have their agencies operating abroad to secure business, they are in a position to carry on. They are given preference further because the act of 1936 and every act that has been passed by this Congress since 1920 says that in the sale and operation preference shall be given to those people who have the support, financial and otherwise, of the respective communities which they serve. We want to preserve that. There appeared before this committee representatives from Boston, representatives from New York, representatives from the Hampton Roads territory, all testifying to the splendid service these operators have rendered. The amendment would provide that these operations could be terminated immediately after the appointment of the Commission, and may be operated for a period of 6 months. We have given a broader discretion to the Commission because we say that after December 31, 1937, they shall be discontinued as soon as practicable. As soon as practicable in the judgment of whom? In the judgment of the Commission, and the benefit of that provision over the other is that you do not throw those lines all on the market at the same time. It may be advisable to terminate the service as to one line and yet it would not be practicable to terminate that service as to another. I believe that upon reflection, if the committee would compare the bill with the proposed amendments, it would find the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries has given greater discretion and liberality to the Commission than does the amendment proposed by my distinguished friend.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last two words. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEARIN] takes a just pride in the enactment of the Subsidy Act of last year. I fought shoulder to shoulder with him on that. He rendered able service in writing that legislation. I am compelled to believe, however, that unwittingly, and due to poor leadership in some quarter, in this instance he is rendering a disservice to the American merchant marine.

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I cannot yield at this time. This pending bill was originally introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'LEARY], and provided for the extension of this period for a full year. As a result of full, adequate, and complete hearings, at which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEARIN] was not present—he is no longer a member of the committee—the amendment offered by the chairman of the committee was written after full and careful consideration of all of the facts. I shall not undertake to criticize the Executive for failing to appoint a full-time, full-fledged commission, although it has seemed to me that that would be a most desirable thing. The amendment of the gentleman from Iowa offers bad draftsmanship, because it provides that this contingency shall continue until the President appoints five members to the Commission. He has appointed three so far, but they are only tentative. The gentleman from Iowa predicates his amendment and this proposed regulation for an extension of time upon some future act of the President.

It seems to me it is writing legislation on a contingency which involves the ability to peer into the mind of the distinguished occupant of the White House as to when he is going to appoint this commission. Much as I admire the distinguished gentleman from Iowa, I know that neither he nor any other American has that power, because the mind of the President is not only devious but it is also very able. I am saying that for the benefit of the other side. I am opposed to this amendment. It makes confusion worst confounded. I am strong in my devotion, and unyielding in that, to the cause of an adequate merchant marine, both in personnel and in shape. The amendment offered by this committee has been fully considered, carefully considered, and it does no violence to the questions raised by the gentleman from Iowa. I trust that in the interest of orderly legislation the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa will be rejected. I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CULKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman infers that this amendment of mine with reference to granting a free hand to the commission or to the authority when it is appointed is befogging the issue. The gentleman understands, does he not, that under the language of the present bill——

Mr. CULKIN. Oh, I beg the gentleman not to lecture me.

Mr. WEARIN. The gentleman understands that under the present language of the bill you cannot by any means expect to make any changes in the present set-up until after December 31, no matter what happens.

Mr. CULKIN. That is a leading question, of course.

Mr. WEARIN. No; it is not leading; it is just an out-and-out statement of fact, a question of whether the gentleman agrees with it or does not.

Mr. CULKIN. Has the gentleman concluded?

Mr. WEARIN. I have concluded that one question.

Mr. CULKIN. I yielded the gentleman only 1 minute.

Mr. WEARIN. Does the gentleman want to answer the question?

Mr. CULKIN. I will answer this way: The amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa confuses instead of clarifies this problem. I cannot, in the time I have, tell this House about the ramifications of the hearings before the committee. I can say only that the findings of the Commission, this passing, tentative Commission on this proposition, are oppressive and destructive of the interests of the merchant marine. Our committee, after due hearings, found that they were not in the public interest, but were disruptive of American service to France from Boston, New York, and southern ports. We had expert testimony, impartial testimony, not by the carriers interested but by impartial people concerned only with the building up of the merchant marine. After due consideration of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa the committee unanimously rejected the proposed amendment and reported the pending bill. I trust that the amendment will be rejected and the bill as reported passed. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the pro-forma amendment.

Mr. Speaker, I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa will not be adopted. I appreciate the fact that the gentleman from Iowa is deeply interested in the furtherance of our merchant marine. His amendment, however, would work contrary to the best interests of those who are operating the vessels at the present time and contrary to the best interests of the Government.

His amendment is predicated upon an uncertainty. The amendment offered by the committee is definite and specific. The rights of the Government are definitely established by the bill which the committee has reported, and those who are operating the vessels at the present time definitely know what their rights will be. If the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa is adopted it would create an atmosphere of uncertainty. It is an amendment made in good faith and not in any hostile manner, but unconsciously and unintentionally it produces a result which will create uncertainty, first, as to the position of the Government, and, second, as to the position of those who are operating the vessels.

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes; I yield for a question. My friend is very philosophical and sometimes delves into things deeply.

Mr. WEARIN. I appreciate the generosity of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. And may I say that I made that statement as a compliment? I wish I had the gentleman's mental capacity.

Mr. WEARIN. The gentleman surpasses me in that respect, and I am sure he realizes that this particular amendment of mine will protect the interest of the present charter operators better than it is protected by the present language of the bill. There is no uncertainty whatever for them under my amendment, and it will do so without violating the spirit of the 1936 act. I am sure that the gentleman from Massachusetts believes that the maritime authority should have the power to determine the policy with reference to our merchant marine; does he not?

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman goes pretty far afield. Let us review the history of this section. This provision was to become operative 1 year after June 29, 1936. Only three members have been appointed, and they have not yet been confirmed by the Senate. They were not appointed until September; so, from June 29 until sometime in September went by before any action was taken. That time is taken out of the time allowed in the original section 704.

In justice to those who are operating these vessels, that should be given consideration. Three members of a commission of five have been appointed. There is justification for this delay, but it has created uncertainty. If the gentleman, I, or any three Members of the House were appointed tentatively and our appointments had not been confirmed, we would hesitate to establish any policy—first, because we were only three of five members; and, second, because we had not been confirmed by the Senate. All that works against the operators of the vessels.

The operators are entitled to equitable consideration. If there is to be an extension, which I urge, then, as between the uncertainty expressed in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa and the certainty expressed in the bill reported by the committee, I feel that the House should go along with the committee with its expression of certainty, rather than the uncertainty of the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be read again.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Clerk will again read the amendment.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WEARIN moves to amend by striking all after the word "operators", in line 1 on page 2, as far as the colon in line 6, and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "under existing operating agreements until a commission of five members is duly appointed and confirmed by the Senate and thereafter may be so opened for a period not to exceed 6 months."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WEARIN) there were—ayes 9, noes 69.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was, on motion of Mr. BLAND, laid on the table.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks; and I also ask that this privilege be granted my colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'LEARY], the author of the bill, who is detained on account of sickness.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there anything further from the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries?

Mr. BLAND. The committee has nothing further at this time, Mr. Speaker.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WELCH, Mr. WEARIN, Mr. CULKIN, and Mr. MCCORMACK asked and were given permission to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD.

COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 2692) to provide national flags for the burials of honorably discharged former service men and women, and that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. Speaker, I make this request as a result of a conference with the chairman of both these committees, this action being agreeable to them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. CROWE, for today, on account of official business.

To Mr. KELLY of New York, for 1 week, on account of business.

To Mr. MAY (at the request of Mr. SPENCE), indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. ROMJUE (at the request of Mr. WILLIAMS), on account of important business.

To Mr. ALESHIRE (at the request of Mr. MCSWEENEY), on account of illness.

To Mr. MOUTON, for 3 days, on account of important official business.

To Mr. RUTHERFORD, for Thursday and Friday, on account of business.

To Mr. HENNINGS (at the request of Mr. WILLIAMS), on account of official business.

To Mr. LANHAM (at the request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas), for today, on account of illness.

Mr. GEHRMANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday next, after the reading of the Journal and disposition of matters on the Speaker's table, I may be permitted to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would prefer that the gentleman make the request for later. Monday is set aside for consideration of bills on the Consent Calendar, and there are quite a number of bills on that calendar to be called up. Can the gentleman come in tomorrow and make his speech?

Mr. GEHRMANN. There are so many on for tomorrow, and I had not figured on making the speech until next week.

Mr. RAYBURN. I wish the gentleman would defer his request for the present. I do not know of a time when speeches were permitted on Consent Calendar day. The Members who have bills pending on that calendar are anxious to have them called. Tuesday, I may say to the gentleman, is Private Calendar day, and the Members are very anxious to have their bills called on that day.

Mr. BOILEAU. There have been speeches made on Tuesday during this session.

Mr. RAYBURN. May I ask the gentleman to withhold his request and I will talk with him tomorrow?

Mr. GEHRMANN. This is the first time I have asked for time, and I would like to have the opportunity as soon as possible. I could have made it Friday, but I understand there is not going to be a session on Friday, and that is the reason I made the request for Monday.

Mr. RAYBURN. Could not the gentleman make his speech tomorrow?

Mr. GEHRMANN. There are too many ahead of me.

Mr. BOILEAU. It will take all day tomorrow to take care of the speeches we have.

Mr. RAYBURN. I just want to protect the two calendars and the Members who have bills on those calendars. Of course, I would like to accede to the gentleman's desires, but if I agree to his request to speak on Monday, then someone else will want 15 minutes following him, and it would be a rather embarrassing situation.

Mr. BOILEAU. Is there going to be a session on Friday?

Mr. RAYBURN. The intention is to adjourn over.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Will there be a Calendar Wednesday next week?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes. Would the gentleman be satisfied to speak on Tuesday after the bills on the Private Calendar are called? I do not think that will take all afternoon.

Mr. GEHRMANN. That will be all right. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Tuesday next, after disposition of bills on the Private Calendar, I may be permitted to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on the Library, I am very much interested in the acceptance of the gift so generously made by Mr. Andrew W. Mellon. I do not expect to be able to be here when the measure is called up, as I am called to Texas upon a sad errand. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER] tells me he hopes to be able to get it before the House for consideration quite soon. I wish to say that the Committee on the Library has made a very careful study of the measure and we had a very interesting hearing, one of the most interesting hearings I ever attended. There appeared at that hearing several witnesses who furnished the committee with much information, including representatives of the District administration, one of the Commissioners, the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, a member of the Fine Arts Commission, and at least two of those interested with Mr. Mellon, together with the architect of the building. We found that every interest in the city and in the Government is united in the merits of the proposition and a desire that the Government should follow the advice and request of President Roosevelt that this very generous gift on the part of Mr. Mellon be promptly accepted.

The chairman of the committee has circulated among the Members this afternoon copy of Report No. 291, which I commend to your attention. What I am saying now is practically covered in that report. One of the most interesting things to me in the hearing was an inquiry that I made of the gentleman in charge of the art itself as to the value of the donation to be made. His answer was that, of course, it was very difficult to give any actual cash value, but the paintings were rated as being valued in excess of $50,000,000, and with a building to house then costing ten to twelve million dollars, you can see what a wonderful donation to education and art this will be. The building and the paintings will compare most favorably with the celebrated collections of the world.

Therefore, I join the other members of the Committee on the Library in a most urgent request that this gift be accepted by the Congress as soon as possible in order that work may be commenced on the preparation of detailed drawings, the change of roadway and the various other features that will be involved.

The architect, Mr. Pope, of New York, one of the leading architects in the country, has stated that the entire structure undoubtedly could be finished and the collection housed therein in about 2 years. So the sooner this donation is accepted, the quicker, of course, work can be commenced and the people begin to receive the benefit of viewing this marvelous collection of art in one of the finest buildings the world has ever known for such purposes. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RAMSAY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the House of the following title, which was thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H. J. Res. 212. Joint resolution to amend the act entitled "An act to levy an excise tax upon carriers and an income tax upon their employees, and for other purposes", approved August 29, 1935.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Thursday, February 25, 1937, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

386. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the draft of a proposed bill to define the exterior boundaries of the Ute Indian Reservation in the State of Utah, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

387. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the draft of a bill to provide for the residence of the United States commissioners appointed for the national parks, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

388. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the draft of a bill to make available for national park purposes certain lands within the area of the proposed Mammoth Cave National Park, Ky.; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

389. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the draft of a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to accept donations of land, interests in land, buildings, or other property for the extension of national parks; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

390. 534. Also, resolution of the Geneva Chamber of Commerce, requesting that the proposal to enlarge the Supreme Court, or to force the appointment of new Justices to promote the program of the administration, presents a serious threat to our civic liberties, and we protest with conviction any subordination of the Supreme Court to the administration of the hour, no matter how benevolent that administration may be; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin favoring inclusion of the production of agricultural lime in all work programs cooperatively carried on by the Federal and State Governments, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

(See joint resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. LA FOLLETTE.)

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, I present, for printing in the RECORD and appropriate reference, a joint resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Vermont opposing any modification of Federal laws, treaties, or conventions governing the movement of livestock and livestock products, and so forth.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas there is pending before the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate an agreement executed by officials of a foreign country and the United States; and

Whereas that country harbors within its boundaries infectious diseases of livestock, and particularly foot-and-mouth disease, which do not now exist in the United States; and

Whereas said agreement would modify the present embargo against that country which harbors foot-and-mouth disease within its borders and would permit importations of dressed-meat products; and

Whereas the importation of such products would seriously jeopardize the welfare of our livestock industry: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives, That we go on record as vigorously opposing any modification of the existing Federal laws governing the movement of livestock or livestock products from any foreign country harboring foot-and-mouth disease or any other transmissible animal disease of serious economic importance which does not now exist in the United States.

Resolved, That the secretary of state be directed to send a copy of these resolutions to the President of the United States and to each Senator and Representative in the Vermont congressional delegation.

Mr. GIBSON also presented three memorials, numerously signed, by sundry citizens of the State of Vermont, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to reorganize the judicial branch of the Government, especially the proposal to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. RUSSELL presented a resolution adopted by the Central Labor Union of Augusta, Ga., which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas in keeping with the progressive social and economic policies sponsored by the present national administration, the President of the United States has formulated and presented to the Congress certain judicial reforms appertaining to the status of the highest tribunal of our land; and

Whereas said changes, when wrought, would prevent judicial usurpation of the legislative and executive branches of our Government and confine the courts to their legitimate spheres of action; and

Whereas we recognize the futility of enacting legislation dealing with basic economic or social problems vitally affecting the security and welfare of the producing masses of this Nation unless there are adequate assurances that those who are called upon to pass upon the constitutional validity of said legislation are themselves conversant with the underlying social phenomena in our present economic structure; and

Whereas within the past 4 years many of the most vital laws affecting human welfare, passed by the Congress and approved by the President, have been set aside by the barest majority in the decisions of the Supreme Court; and

Whereas the people of the United States, by their mandate last November, have clearly and unmistakably affirmed their confidence and faith in the progressive and liberal policies sponsored by President Roosevelt and his administration: Therefore be it

Resolved, That organized labor of Augusta, represented by the Central Labor Union, in meeting assembled this 17th day of February 1937, unequivocally endorse the pending movement of the President for judicial reform within the Supreme Court and pledge him our loyal and undivided support in this laudable endeavor.

Mr. MURRAY presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Montana, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Senate joint resolution opposing change of laws governing importation of livestock from Argentine

Whereas the Argentine Government and the State Department of the United States Government have negotiated a sanitary convention which has for its purpose the removal of the present sanitary regulations governing the importation of livestock or livestock products from any territory or zone in the Argentine which has temporarily been declared to be free from foot-and-mouth disease; and

Whereas the Argentine and other Republics of South America do not maintain a livestock sanitary organization comparable to the United States Bureau of Animal Industry; and

Whereas the Argentine Government has never inaugurated or carried on a systematic program for the eradication of foot-and-mouth disease, such as has been done by the United States Bureau of Animal Industry; and

Whereas there is grave danger of foot-and-mouth-disease virus being carried by livestock or livestock products from any country where foot-and-mouth disease exists; and

Whereas if foot-and-mouth disease ever became endemic in the State of Montana it would contaminate domestic and wild animals on the open plains, the deserts, and mountain regions of the West, would spread infection and be uncontrollable, with the probable effect of almost annihilating both domestic and wild animals, thus destroying the meat-food supply of our Nation and one of our major industries, and bring financial disaster to the great majority of our citizens; and

Whereas such sanitary pact is now before the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate of the United States for ratification: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Twenty-fifth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, both houses concurring, respectfully petition the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate of the United States that they do not recommend the ratification of the sanitary convention now pending before its body; and be it further

Resolved, That we petition the Honorable Burton K. Wheeler and James E. Murray, Congressmen James F. O'Connor and Jerry J. O'Connell, Secretary of State Cordell Hull, and Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt to use their every endeavor to defeat the ratification of this sanitary pact with the Argentine, and that they vigorously oppose any modification of the existing Federal laws governing the movement of livestock or livestock products from any country where foot-and-mouth disease exists.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Joint resolution urging the Congress of the United States to include the production of agricultural lime in all work programs carried out by the Federal Government

Whereas a proper solution of the problem of soil conservation arising through soil erosion and depletion of soil fertility is of the most urgent necessity; and

Whereas the dairy farmers of Wisconsin and of other dairy States must grow more feed crops, especially alfalfa, for the dairy herd, and can readily grow such feed crops in the course of a proper crop rotation; and

Whereas the growing of leguminous crops, especially alfalfa, is an essential feature of a soil-conservation program, both from the standpoint of checking and preventing soil erosion and the addition of nitrogen to the soil; and

Whereas the correction of acidity of the soil through the addition of agricultural lime is essential to the growing of leguminous crops, especially alfalfa in Wisconsin, in which State fully 80 percent of the soil is acid and in need of lime; and

Whereas, of the 8,000,000 acres of acid arable land in Wisconsin, it is estimated that only 2,000,000 acres have been limed, leaving at least 6,000,000 acres to be so treated, which would result in a direct benefit to 150,000 farmers in Wisconsin, or 75 percent of the total number of farmers in the State; and

Whereas the program for the production of agricultural lime, heretofore carried out by the Works Progress Administration in cooperation with the College of Agriculture of the University of Wisconsin and the various county agencies in the State, has proven to be especially adaptable to a works program by reason of the low other-than-labor costs involved in such production; and

Whereas a total of nearly 2,000,000 tons of pulverized limestone, marl, and papermill sludge have been produced and delivered to Wisconsin farmers during the past 2½ years, which was made available to Wisconsin farmers at greatly reduced costs under county-sponsored W. E. R. A. and W. P. A. work projects; and

Whereas the agricultural lime program has been the most popular of all projects undertaken by the Works Progress Administration because of its demonstrated worth, for the following more important reasons, among others:

1. The acreage of alfalfa in Wisconsin in the past 2-year period has increased from 525,000 acres harvested in 1934 to 1,171,000 acres in 1936, which large increase was made possible by the extensive use of lime.

2. The application of lime to the acid lime-deficient soils in Wisconsin is in reality making a capital investment in the State's greatest asset, the soil, and the rebuilding of the depleted fertility of Wisconsin farms will secure to the farmers a higher net income and a greater purchasing power, which in turn will reflect itself in greater prosperity and industry.

3. Authorative estimates show that the 2,000,000 tons of lime already applied to Wisconsin farm lands in the past 2-year period has added at least $100,000,000 to the potential income of Wisconsin farmers; and

Whereas the agricultural lime program has not operated to the detriment of private enterprise but rather has widened its opportunity through providing increased appreciation of the value of agricultural lime; and

Whereas the attempts on the part of counties in Wisconsin to secure approval of additional lime projects have been disapproved by the General Accounting Office in Washington on the ground that "These projects are considered by the General Accounting Office to be subsidies to a selected class, namely, farmers. There is no provision in the Emergency Relief Act of 1936 for making such subsidies"; and

Whereas the lime program heretofore carried out will terminate on the completion of presently authorized projects and thereafter agricultural lime will not be available except at prices materially higher than under such program: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That this legislature emphatically calls to the attention of the Congress the foregoing facts and urges the Congress to include the production of agricultural lime, similar to that heretofore carried out by the Works Progress Administration, in any and all works programs cooperatively carried on by the Federal and State governments, for the most impelling reason that the soil conservation service resulting from such a program is of the greatest public, as well as private, benefit and is most deeply involved in the promotion of the general welfare; be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, to each House of the Congress, and to each Wisconsin Representative therein.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, memorializing Congress to provide for the repayment of Wisconsin emergency relief administration loans made to farmers in drought-stricken areas, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

(See joint resolution printed in full when presented by Mr. DUFFY on the 22d instant, p. 1467, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

Mr. LA FOLLETTE also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, memorializing Congress to enact more simplified and stringent regulatory measures for aircraft, and also other legislation tending to lessen the hazards of aviation, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WALSH presented the following resolution of the General Court of Massachusetts, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Order relative to opposing enactment by Congress of any legislation giving the President authority to appoint additional Judges to the Supreme Court

Whereas there is pending before the Congress of the United States a bill submitted to it by the President seeking a reorganization of the judicial department of the Government of the United States; and

Whereas a part of that bill would empower the executive department of the United States to dominate the judicial department by the appointment of additional Judges to the Supreme Court; and

Whereas the domination of one branch of the Government by another is contrary to the fundamental concept of American government: Now, therefore, be it

Ordered, That the General Court of Massachusetts hereby records its opposition to the enactment by the Congress of the United States of any legislation which would give the President authority to appoint additional Judges to the Supreme Court; and be it further Ordered, That certified copies of this order be transmitted forthwith by the secretary of the Commonwealth to the President of the United States, to the presiding officer of each branch of Congress, and to the Members thereof from this Commonwealth.

Mr. WALSH also presented a resolution of the General Court of Massachusetts, favoring an amendment to the Constitution providing for the determination and establishment of minimum wages for women and children, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(See resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. LODGE.)

Mr. LODGE presented the following resolution of the General Court of Massachusetts, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolution memorializing Congress to propose an amendment to the United States Constitution relative to the determination and establishment of minimum wages for women and children

Whereas for more than 20 years the legal status of legislation providing for minimum wages for women and children has been in doubt, and under court decisions such legislation, when mandatory, has been declared unconstitutional; and

Whereas the abolition of sweatshop labor and starvation wages is a matter of grave public concern, demanding immediate action: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Court of Massachusetts hereby respectfully requests the Congress of the United States to propose an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to provide for the determination and establishment of minimum wages for women and children; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be forwarded by the secretary of the Commonwealth to the presiding officers of both branches of the Congress of the United States and to the Members thereof from this Commonwealth.

Mr. LODGE also presented a resolution of the General Court of Massachusetts, protesting against the enactment of legislation to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(See resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. WALSH.)

PROPOSED ENLARGEMENT OF THE SUPREME COURT—PETITION

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I present, for appropriate reference, a petition signed by 1,846 citizens resident in the State of Utah. I ask that the body of the petition be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and the body thereof was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UTAH CHAPTER PRO AMERICA—PETITION TO CONGRESS

We, the undersigned, respectfully urge that you make every effort to defeat the proposal of President Roosevelt to increase the number of Judges on the Supreme Court of the United States. We regard this as an attempt to enlarge the Court to produce certain immediate decisions by Executive rather than by judicial authority, and inevitably to create a permanent subservience of the courts to the Executive. In our opinion, this would undermine the foundations upon which American institutions rest.

EXTENSION OF AUTHORITY TO NEGOTIATE TRADE AGREEMENTS

The Senate resumed consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 96) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the so-called Vandenberg amendment.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan, which is the pending question, will be stated by the clerk for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to add at the end of the joint resolution the following:

Provided, That after the enactment of this joint resolution no trade agreement shall include any provision in any way undertaking to limit the power of Congress over internal taxes.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, the pending joint resolution presents questions of very grave importance. Prerequisite to the consideration of tariff rates and of tariff structures is the broad question of national policy which has been but little discussed during this debate. Yet we all know a fundamental question is the extent to which the Nation is to become self-contained, and that question underlies the fixing of tariff rates. We all know we may resort to a sort of national quarantine, either complete or partial, or we may expose ourselves to every alien influence by seeking and developing trade in all quarters of the world. Fundamental questions are whether we shall maintain our position as a creditor nation; whether we shall seek to maintain a balance of trade in our own favor; the questions that relate to neutrality to our relations to the other nations of the world; the question as to whether we are safer under a quarantine or under exposure which comes from a far-flung foreign trade.

These questions are of such great importance I think every Member of this body would be prepared to admit that they ought to be determined by the Congress. I have heard no suggestion in this debate or in the debate in 1934 that matters of such importance ought to be delegated to the keeping of any bureau in the executive branch of the Government.

Prior to the act of June 12, 1934, we were maintaining a policy with respect to our foreign trade and to our tariff structure. That policy was effectuated by a protective tariff. It was measured, in theory and, to a large extent, in practice, by the difference between the cost of production abroad and at home. I recognize, as we all recognize, that there have been variations from that policy. It was not always applied uniformly; it was not always applied equitably as between industries. In some instances duties were too high; in others duties were too low. Often economic changes in the world required changes in duty that could not well be made except under the application of the so-called flexible provisions which were written into the last two tariff laws prior to the act of 1934.

Admitting those variations, the fact remains that for many years our policy was one of protection, measuring the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad.

The act of 1934 definitely scuttled this policy, not in its express terms, but by indirection. It has for its avowed purpose the expansion of our foreign trade. I imagine that no one would maintain that this avowed purpose has been adhered to in the administration of the act. To some extent I suppose it is true that the purpose of the act has been adhered to, but in very many respects it has not. The act of June 12, 1934, has been employed by the State Department for many purposes aside from expansion of our foreign trade. It has been employed among other things for the destruction of the trade balance heretofore existing in our favor.

Yesterday the able senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] called attention most graphically to our loss of trade balance and to the effect of the law upon the agricultural elements of our country. I shall not develop that matter further except to say in passing that I am entirely in accord with what the distinguished Senator from Idaho said yesterday.

I want to refer to the language of the act of 1934. It begins with this declaration:

For the purpose of expanding foreign markets for the products of the United States (as a means of assisting in the present emergency in restoring the American standard of living, in overcoming domestic unemployment in the present economic depression, * * *)—

And so forth.

It is quite obvious, not only from a reading of the language to which I have invited attention but from the debates which took place in the Senate and the House at the time of the enactment of the legislation, that the purpose of nearly all those who were supporting the legislation was to improve our economic condition by expanding our foreign trade.

As I said, the avowed purpose of the act has not always been carried out. One of those most intimately connected with the execution of the act is Dr. Sayre, whom we all know personally or by reputation. There was placed in the RECORD in the House of Representatives a certain quotation from an address which Dr. Sayre had delivered at New York City. I want to restate here the language which was quoted in the debate in the House of Representatives from the statement made by Dr. Sayre, as follows:

We are coming within striking distance of a balance between exports and imports. This may be but a temporary phenomenon. * * * But at least we are moving in the right direction. And it is of high importance that this balance is being reached, not through a reduction of exports * * * but through a substantial increase of imports. * * *

So we find that the loss of the balance of trade commented upon yesterday by the Senator from Idaho was not a mere incident but apparently was a thing definitely in the mind of one of those who was charged in a most important way with responsibility for the execution of the law.

Another who spoke with reference to the purpose of the trade treaties was Dr. Grady. He was at that time chief of the division in the State Department, having charge of foreign-trade agreements. Dr. Grady also made a speech on the subject of Reciprocal Trade Agreements. From his speech made in January 1936 I quote:

Our objective is a general amelioration of the world situation.

That, I submit, is something far different and other than the promotion of the foreign trade of the United States. It is a broader objective than the one declared by the Congress, and, like that in the mind of Dr. Sayre, it had never been passed upon by the Congress, but was created in the Department of State in the brains of those gentlemen who are charged with the execution of the law.

In another speech on trade agreements delivered in California in December 1935, Dr. Grady made this statement:

> We are to a greater degree than ever before meshing our domestic economy into the world economy.

I do not know that I could interpret this language with accuracy, but it is fairly apparent from the statements of Dr. Grady that the trade treaties were regarded as a sort of commercial league of nations, and the objectives announced by the Congress have been disregarded in behalf of nebulous theories of world betterment in which these gentlemen are obviously primarily interested.

Secretary of State Hull, in his recent explanation of the results of the act before the Ways and Means Committee of the House, talked much of the attainment of peace by expansion of foreign trade. In his efforts to defend the act as he has administered it, he placed the greatest emphasis upon the supposition that the peace of this Nation has been promoted by the trade treaties which he had made.

I will not take time to discuss the theoretic question whether peace is promoted in this fashion. There is a school of thought which believes that our peace is promoted in a more secure way if we do not become dependent to too great an extent upon trade with the other nations of the world. In this school of thought it is believed that a nation, self-contained, self-sufficient, and self-reliant, is safer both in peace and war than a nation which is dependent upon the vagaries of world politics for its security.

We are all as much interested in peace as is the Secretary of State. I do not mention his position with the idea of criticizing the view which he entertains. I do not want to enter into that dispute at all. However, I do want to say that, so far as he is concerned, his purpose in the enforcement and execution of this law is just as far afield from the avowed purpose declared by the act as is the purpose of Dr. Sayre and Dr. Grady. All of these gentlemen, in their efforts to employ the powers which have been delegated to them through this act, have indulged in nebulous and wishful thinking. All of them are engaged in trying experiments. All of them seem willing—indeed, I think it is right to say they are willing—to sacrifice the American export trade and destroy the balance of trade which our country has enjoyed in order that they may bring about a condition which they privately believe will be for the benefit of this Nation.

Mr. President, I am enlarging upon this part of the case because in my mind the major evil of this kind of legislation is not the specific objections that we sometimes make to it. The major evil comes from the fact that the Congress has shirked its responsibility. It has failed to declare the policy of the country. It has delegated that power to the Executive, who has again delegated it to the Secretary of State; and the Secretary of State has delegated it to Mr. Sayre, and part of the time to Dr. Grady, and part of the time to others. The determination is now made in the remote recesses of the State Department, and there is nobody on this floor who can tell us today the exact purpose of that Department; nobody who can tell us precisely what is in the minds of the people who are engaged in negotiating these treaties and putting them into effect.

With respect to the proposal for a trade agreement with Great Britain, we do not know what the nature of that agreement may be. We are not consulted with regard to it. We only know that somebody in the State Department will be engaged in negotiations with representatives of the British Government, and that if they reach a deal whereby they think they can increase imports, that deal probably will be accepted by the Secretary of State and approved by the President of the United States.

That is the situation with which we will be confronted when the pending joint resolution becomes law.

I desire now to make a brief reference to the question of constitutionality.

At the time the original law was under consideration in this body, a number of us argued that the main feature of the law was unconstitutional, in that it constituted a delegation of the legislative power of Congress to the Executive, and also in that there was no standard provided for the guidance of the Executive; and, because there was no standard the law was condemned by the theory of cases which had been decided by the Supreme Court with respect to the tariff laws of 1890 and 1922.

I will not track again over the ground I covered at that time. Since that discussion the Supreme Court has spoken twice, in two very important decisions, one of which was unanimous and in the other of which the Court was divided, as I remember, 8 to 1. In those decisions the Court again considered the question of the standard which is necessary in order to save legislation from being subject to the charge of unconstitutional delegation of legislative power. Those decisions confirm and support the arguments which we made at that time; and if Senators are sincerely interested in the examination of that question they have but to turn to the act of 1934 to find that in it, although there is a declaration of purpose, there is not even the vestige of a standard of executive conduct. There is not even a hint, there is not anything from which a deduction may be made. I think it is accurate to say that not even a fair inference may be drawn. There is not a basis of any kind, express or implied, upon which the executive branch of the Government may determine what their rule of action should be in entering into these trade treaties.

Worse, though, than the unconstitutionality of the act, so far as its effect upon the business of the country is concerned, are certain specific objections, some of them economic in their character.

One is that the act is so lacking in restraint and boundary that the executive agents of the Government, known and unknown to us, may reward one industry at the expense, yes, even the destruction, of another. They may reward one area of the country at the expense of another. The same objection could be made to the enactment of a tariff bill by the Congress; but there is a vast difference in the two procedures. Whatever else may be said of the enactment of tariff legislation by the Congress, the facts remain—they are everywhere admitted and nowhere denied—that the evidence presented to the Congress is presented to the two committees in broad daylight and in public hearings.

Records are made of the testimony. The information is printed. It is available to everyone, both within and without the Congress. Reports are made by the committees, and the reports are printed and are available to everyone, both within and without the Congress. Finally, when the day of debate arrives, the debate is public, in the presence of the occupants of the galleries, in the presence of the representatives of the press; and finally the record is written down, and becomes a permanent part of the records of our Government. At least there is no secret in the making of the ordinary tariff bill.

When we get down to a consideration of the trade treaties, however, and especially during the time no information was given to American producers as to the items to be considered in those treaties, when we know that the only presentation that can be made is made to a buffer committee which does not participate in the making of the treaty, and that the evidence adduced before the buffer committee may or may not be considered by those who are actually charged with making the agreement; when we reflect that the details of the agreement are worked out by subordinates in the State Department, by members of certain committees, and that those committees change like the changing tides, that different men are introduced in the discussion of different subjects, and that none of us know who any of them are; when we realize, too, that the foreign negotiators are better advised than we are advised concerning the subject of the discussion, and are in position to exercise a greater influence upon our representatives than are the American producers; when we take into consideration, finally, that the ensuing agreement is not subject to ratification by the Senate; and when we realize, on top of it all, that these so-called trade agreements have been employed to abrogate and suspend previously executed treaties of the United States, we can realize the enormity of this situation.

This power ought not to be employed by any bureaucracy, by any Secretary of State, by any one man anywhere. There ought not to be a delegation of power to say that the automobile industry shall prosper, that we will make trades for its benefit, but that agriculture shall languish, that we will make concessions at the expense of the farmers of America in order that the great automobile industry may become still greater.

I make no attack upon any industry. I am not complaining of any treaty in particular, but I find most serious objection to the creation by legislative act of power in any executive branch of our Government to reward one group of our citizens at the expense of another.

Another specific objection is that the law permits our markets to be bartered away. I should not complain if concessions were made upon noncompetitive items, if our State Department would encourage the bringing into our country of goods which we do not and cannot produce. That is not the question here. I complain that the State Department is permitted to barter away the American market to foreign producers with respect to articles which we ourselves can and do manufacture, thus excluding our own people from our own markets; and I have not heard in this debate anything which I have regarded as an adequate justification of this proposition.

It is bad enough if done by the Congress, but at least here all the States are represented, all the districts are represented, everybody is given a hearing. More than that, when a law is enacted it has a certain degree of permanency; but these duties created by treaty are just as fugitive as the winds that blow. Duties have been reduced in one treaty and then reduced again in another treaty, and the industry which has lost its market or some part of its right to enjoy the American market wakes up tomorrow to find out that it has sustained a still further loss; so that the loss of market becomes only a part of the evil. The uncertainty that surrounds the production of goods in this country becomes a part of the evil also.

A third specific objection is that this law permits a group of theorists and dreamers in the State Department to apply their vagrant theories and employ devices to destroy the trade balance of the Nation.

Mr. President, I do not claim that we should always follow the practice of unlimited expansion in the balance of trade. It may well be that our position as a creditor nation just after the World War was not a favorable position from all aspects; that there is some advantage in bringing the trade relationship nearer into balance. I do not debate that question at all; but I do say that a matter of that kind is so great in its importance that if it is to be dealt with, it ought to be dealt with by the Congress as a part of the national economy. I do say that no clerk, no professor, no dreamer, no theorist anywhere, ought to be placed by legislation in position to deal with a subject of that kind, and that one of the vices of this law is that it has permitted exactly that sort of thing to be done.

Senators will remember that at the time this act was debated a most strenuous effort was made by some of us, following the leadership of the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], to eliminate the consideration of agricultural tariffs entirely in the making of these trade the evil of the act of 1934 would have been averted if agri- agreements. In that effort we failed, and I have very much regretted that failure. I think much of the hardship and culture could have been eliminated entirely from the consideration of the experts and pseudo experts who are directing the affairs of our State Department in the making of these treaties. But agriculture was not eliminated. We have seen instance after instance of countries appearing at our door demanding concessions upon agricultural items. I understand 88 definite reductions have been made in agricultural tariffs.

We have seen our dairy industry and our livestock industry and other agricultural industries exposed to the competition of peoples whose costs do not exceed half the cost of production in the United States. We know that the importations of foreign agricultural products has not destroyed our markets in entirety; they have not deprived us entirely of the right to enjoyment of those markets; but there is no question at all, as Senators can determine if they will watch the quotations day after day, but that the appearance here of foreign-grown beef, and the appearance here of foreign-made dairy products, have affected our price levels to the disadvantage of the American producer.

Every Member of this body knows as well as I know the serious plight in which the farmer finds himself. We do know that, generally speaking, the American farmer stands with his back to the wall. We have sought by every means within our power to lighten his debt burden, to cut down his interest charge. We have sought in many other ways to bring him aid. Much has been done in his behalf. But I wish now to express my concurrence with what was said by the Senator from Idaho yesterday, that unless we give the American farmer the enjoyment of the American market to the extent of his ability to supply that market, the American farmer will never again come back to a condition of economic independence. He will, in fact, be as he was pictured in a recent report submitted to the Congress. He will tend toward peasantry, and there will come before this Nation in the not-too-distant future a more serious question than any question we are considering here now, the question of rehabilitation of a fallen and destroyed agriculture in the United States.

This condition ought not to be countenanced; it ought not to be tolerated. As far as I am concerned, I cannot bring myself to the support of a reciprocity measure which may make the farmer's condition worse.

I realize the futility of protesting here. I know that nothing said from this side of the aisle will change the result in the consideration of the pending joint resolution. But I am happy to have the opportunity to record my dissent, to make my objection, and to let the RECORD show that there are still some of us concerned with the realities of this situation, and concerned sufficiently to take a stand in behalf of the producers of our country.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I am not willing that this matter should be disposed of without expressing, just as briefly as I can, my views concerning it.

In 1934 my vote was cast against the bill giving to the President the authority which the pending joint resolution proposes to extend. The original legislation vested in the President power to give preference to one section of our country at the cost of another section; to build one industry on the ruins of another; to encourage the employment of one citizen by bringing idleness to another. It was a power without check upon its arbitrary use. It was a power from which there was no appeal.

I was unwilling in 1934 to give to any one person this character and degree of authority over the agricultural and industrial life of our Nation and over the fortunes of the American citizen. I did not believe we could constitutionally so do.

Every objection which in 1934 made appeal to me today urges me to oppose the pending joint resolution, and the experience of the 2 years last past suggests further reasons for disapproval of the measure before the Senate.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN], and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] have made reference to the asserted right to deal with the internal tax structure of the United States by these treaties. I venture the assertion that no one in this body seriously contemplated the assertion of such a right by the President when the 1934 act was under consideration. The very whisper of a suspicion that such a right was given brought from the chairman of the Finance Committee the direct assurance that it was not intended by either House or Senate to give any such power to deal with the excise taxes of our country. The Secretary of State, at the hearing before the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, gave like assurance.

Notwithstanding this denial upon the highest legislative authority in such a matter, the Department asserts the right to do this thing, and it has exercised that right in the Brazilian, the Colombian, and the Cuban treaties, and in respect to one item of one other treaty. This asserted right, even if it stood alone, would compel me to vote against the pending joint resolution.

A further usurpation and abuse of power not anticipated, I venture, by a single Senator is the suspension of a treaty entered into by the United States, with the ratification of the Senate, by a so-called trade agreement never submitted to this body. The right is asserted to bring to a temporary and a solemn obligation, sanctioned in constitutional manner and form, by a mere agreement approved by neither the Congress nor the Senate.

What treaties of the United States the administration claims the right thus to suspend, what treaties it will in effect abrogate, I do not know. I do hazard the opinion that no precedent and no authority can be found in law or in usage for the proposition that an obligation of the highest solemnity can be suspended or abrogated except as provided therein, or by an act or instrument of equal dignity. The assertion of this right is without warrant, and is an added reason for refusing the extension of the authority to the Department which claims it.

I oppose the joint resolution before us because of my conviction that in their general results the treaties already negotiated work to the harm of the agricultural interests of our country and do not contribute to the general welfare. I believe in the character of reciprocity approved yesterday by the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. I would facilitate by every possible means the exchange of our surpluses for those things which we have not. I can see no good which can come to agriculture as a whole by reason of opening the American market to agricultural commodities which we can produce in this country to the capacity of our people to buy.

Speaking even more generally, I think it may be said that the acquisition of foreign markets may cost us more than such foreign markets are worth. In the 23 years preceding 1932 our total income from all exports averaged only 7.45 percent of the national income. In our recent efforts to increase this 7.45 percent we should not jeopardize the 92.55 percent of income which comes from our American market. This, I fear, is what is happening under these reciprocal-trade agreements. Through them we are scrapping the protective principle. Although we have entered into but 15 of these treaties, and although the nations with whom the treaties have been made took in 1935 less than 25 percent of our agricultural exports, there has resulted a reduction of duty for practically the world in at least 250 items heretofore enjoying tariff protection. The protective principle was designed to retain, in competitive goods, the American market for the American producer at an American price. These trade treaties are a proposal to swap the American market for a foreign market in which world prices obtain.

What is taking place? Our balance of trade grows less and less. In 1936 it reached the low for nearly half a century of time. In 1934 the balance was $478,000,000; in 1935 it had shrunk to $235,000,000; and in the past year it shrunk to a pitiable $34,000,000.

Mr. President, the Canadian reciprocal treaty is of special interest to the State of Maine and to me. Fully to understand what has taken place, it must be borne in mind that Canada has a three-tariff system. First, she has the Empire preferential rates, which are the lowest. These rest on the Ottawa conference, and are designed to facilitate trade between members of the British Empire, and to give definite tariff preferences to the units of the Empire. There are next the so-called intermediate rates, which generally are given to nations making special trade agreements with Canada. Then there are the general rates, which are the highest.

In addition to these three general classifications, Canada has certain other rates found in trade agreements she has entered into. These special arrangements fix rates far below the intermediate rates; and the United States alone among the principal commercial nations has paid the highest rate of Canadian tariffs.

We further should have in mind the fact that Canada's chief exports are agricultural, forest, fishery, and mineral products, and that her chief imports are manufactured goods, including a substantial volume of machinery intended and used for the increase of her industrial efficiency.

The trade agreement with Canada became effective January 1 of the past year. Speaking generally, Canada made concessions to the United States chiefly on manufactured products, and the United States made concessions to Canada chiefly on agricultural, forest, and fishery products. On the basis of 1929 trade, reductions of duty on agricultural, forest, and fishery products constitute about 86.7 percent of our concessions to Canada, while manufactured and miscellaneous items make up about 73.8 percent of the concessions made to us by Canada. These agricultural concessions, constituting so large a part of the total concessions made to Canada, were granted in violation of assurances given during the political campaign of 1932 that no agricultural tariff would be reduced.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARKLEY in the chair). Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. WHITE. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. Does the Senator from Maine recognize that the power which we are asked to extend for 3 more years would enable the Chief Executive to reduce the duties—that is to say, make additional concessions—on the identical products concerning which we have already made a trade with Canada, and thus cut them still further through the operation of the most-favored-nation treatment?

Mr. WHITE. The Senator from Vermont is correct; and we have made a trade that no Yankee from Vermont would ever have made [laughter], as I shall undertake to show in a moment.

Let us now consider how this arrangement with Canada has worked out in the few months during which it has been in effect. Our concessions made to Canada are real concessions, but in most instances the advantages said to have been given to us by Canada are not real, for the reason that they have not met at all the rate accorded by Canada to all the parts of the British Empire, but are still substantially in excess thereof.

A few illustrations will make this point clear. Under the Canadian treaty the duty on American raisins—and this may be of interest to the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]—was reduced from the general rate of 3 cents a pound to the intermediate rate of 3 cents a pound, which is no reduction at all, while Australian raisins continue to pour into Canada free of duty. We have in truth received no concession at all in this regard.

Print cotton further illustrates what has happened. Under the treaty the duty on print cotton entering Canada from the United States was reduced from 32.5 percent, plus 4 cents a pound, to the intermediate rate of 27.5 percent, plus 3½ cents a pound; but the United Kingdom continues to enjoy the Empire rate of 22.5 percent, plus 2 cents a pound. We are still at a definite disadvantage in the Canadian market as against the cotton print of the United Kingdom, and we shall continue to lose in the Canadian market so long as Great Britain retains her preferential rate over us.

I give another illustration: Under the reciprocal treaty the duty on vacuum cleaners coming from the United States—and these are but illustrations of the principle to which I have made reference—was reduced from the general rate of 25 percent to the intermediate rate of 20 percent; but the preferential rate to the Empire is 12½ percent, substantially under the new American rate.

These, Mr. President, are examples of the fact that, in many instances, we are getting from Canada no concessions not already given to a considerable number of other nations, and, with minor exceptions, no concessions at all which approach the rate accorded by Canada to the Empire; but the advantages we have accorded Canada are real, and as a result thereof American agriculture suffers.

For the first 9 months of 1936 our exports to Canada increased by $33,000,000, while Canadian imports into the United States increased by $58,000,000. The most significant fact about these figures is that in the third quarter there was an increase in imports of $28,000,000, while our exports increased by only $10,000,000. This shows the cumulative trend against us with respect to Canadian importations into our country.

Mr. President, narrowing our figures to the agricultural trade with Canada for this 9-month period, we find that on items with reduced duties our exports increased by 36 percent, while our imports increased by 104 percent. On items on which duties were unchanged our exports increased by 12 percent; our imports by only 41 percent. This 104-percent increase in imports is a demonstration of what the Canadian treaty is doing to American agriculture.

The notable increases in imports, as well as many of the less significant increases, are upon the products of Maine. Almost every product of the farm, the forest, and the sea along our Maine shore comes also from the farm, the forest, and the sea of Canada. Concessions in regard to the products could only be at the expense of the industries and the people of my State. Under this treaty, hay, apples, poultry, cream, beans, potatoes, cheese, and other farm products, lumber and shingles, and various fishery products face the increased competition which lower duties on these commodities make inevitable, and to which it was intended they should be subjected.

The Canadian treaty freezes upon the free list other commodities of vital concern to Maine and her people. Pulp, pulpwood, and newsprint continue to face the competition of the world, and these products of my State see ahead domestic competition encouraged by public funds. If Government money is to be devoted to enterprises directly competitive with our industry, that industry should have some protection from foreign competition. It should not be required to meet foreign competition and subsidized domestic competition.

Mr. President, this Canadian treaty threatens the industries of my State; it is at the expense of the farmers of the entire Nation. The treaties altogether are opening American agriculture and industry to successful foreign assault. They place in the hands of one man a power which never should be lodged in a single person here in this America of ours. They violate sound constitutional principles. I was against the act of 1934; I am opposed to the pending joint resolution extending the Presidential authority as proposed.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, as has been said here, I realize that it is practically useless to indulge in debate or to interpose any opposition to the pending joint resolution; but I cannot let it pass without expressing myself briefly on the subject.

When in 1934 the original measure was passed giving the President authority to make reciprocal-trade agreements I was opposed to the measure, as I thought it gave the President too much authority, more authority than any President should want or should have, and I thought that such agreements or treaties should be ratified by the Senate in the constitutional way. I am still of the same opinion.

I was much interested the day the joint resolution was reported to the Senate by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], in his explanation of the measure and how it was working. He seemed to want to give the impression that these reciprocal-trade agreements were quite satisfactory; that everything was going very nicely under them; and he rather sarcastically emphasized the fact that no one who came before the committee made any claim that conditions had not improved during the life of the act providing for reciprocal-trade agreements. He said:

> On this point their silence was loud and emphatic.

Mr. President, his statement, it seems to me, was rather unfair, because in 1934, when this act went into effect, we were in the midst of the depression; in 1934 we had one of the worst droughts ever known in the history of the country; and again, in 1936, we also had a severe drought; indeed, in some of the States there had been a continuous drought since about 1931.

So the fact of a continuous drought has made a difference in the prices, of course, of farm products and in the general condition of the farmers, especially of those not in the drought area. The Secretary of Agriculture, when he appeared before the committee, was fair enough to admit that weather conditions, the drought, had had a very decided effect upon the situation; indeed, he mentioned it in three or four places in his statement before the committee. The Secretary of Agriculture, I think, is honestly interested in the welfare of the farmers and is trying to do something for them, but, of course, being one of the promoters of the reciprocal trade agreement policy, he was strongly in favor of it, and he made the statement in his closing remarks before the committee:

> I think agriculture has been given treatment on the whole somewhat better than industry, not a great deal different but somewhat better. I think agriculture has been given a square deal.

Those were the words of the Secretary of Agriculture before the Committee on Finance considering this measure.

But, Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the fact that every representative of a farm organization that appeared before that committee went on record against the original act and against the joint resolution providing for the continuation of the reciprocal-trade agreements unless it be amended.

Immediately following the Secretary's statement in the printed record appears a letter signed by F. R. Marshall, secretary of the National Wool Growers' Association, Salt Lake City, Utah. I desire to read just a few words from his letter, as follows:

> The ill effects flowing from these agreements have paralyzed some of our industries and alarmed all producers of agricultural commodities.
> Agriculture has been and will continue to be the chief sufferer from this policy which increases imports of agricultural commodities produced in the United States sufficient to supply the Nation's needs.

Mr. President, if the wool growers of the Nation were in favor of this measure, they would not have allowed their secretary to make a statement of that kind against it.

Then in the printed hearings follows the statement of Mr. Mollin, secretary of the American National Livestock Association, with headquarters at Denver, Colo. Mr. Mollin was very strong in his statement against the provisions of this measure and gave some very interesting figures in regard to it, especially with respect to cattle. He stated that the total importations of cattle into this country in 1934 were 66,138 head; that in 1935 the importations had increased to 378,124 head; and in 1936, last year, they went up to 410,299 head. He does not claim that all that increase is due to the reciprocal-trade agreements. A part of it, of course, is due to the drought in this country and the shortage of feed for livestock, and so forth, but the fact is that during the life of the reciprocal-trade agreements the imports of cattle, especially the imports from Canada, have increased materially throughout the United States.

My State is on the Canadian border; we feel very materially the effects of the Canadian shipments of livestock, and there is a great deal of protest from the livestock growers of North Dakota and the other border States, especially against the cattle coming in from Canada.

I obtained a statement from the Commerce Department this morning and from the Bureau of Customs in regard to the cattle coming in from Canada. The total shipments of cattle from Canada in 1935 were 112,720 head, but in 1936 the number had more than doubled; the total in that year from Canada being 234,063 head, and the number of cattle 700 pounds in weight and over was 143,219 head.

It was shown that a great many of these cattle from Canada were shipped to the market at South St. Paul and that many of them came through the State of North Dakota on our through lines from Canada to South St. Paul. I wish to call attention to a few statements made by Mr. Mollin in his testimony before the Finance Committee on the pending joint resolution. He gave the figures for a number of days showing the livestock receipts at St. Paul and other livestock markets and the number of cars of cattle from Canada. He starts in with Monday, April 6, 1936.

Cattle receipts, South St. Paul, 5,600—

And there is a note at the bottom stating that St. Paul receipts of Canadian cattle were 80 cars. Mr. President, that would amount to two trainloads of cattle from Canada coming into the St. Paul market on that day. Two trainloads make quite a difference in the market. No one can tell me that a continuation of such shipments by the trainload a day or two trainloads a day of cattle from Canada into any stock market in the United States cannot fail to have an effect upon the market. Even though the cattle were needed for sale and consumption here at home, the buyers would use the fact that foreign shipments of cattle were coming in as an excuse to hammer down the market. The situation became so bad at St. Paul that the Surplus Commodity Corporation—I am not certain that that is correct term—under the Agricultural Department went to St. Paul and bought cattle to keep the market from going too low.

Mr. Mollin gives the figures for several other days. The next date he gives is Monday, April 13, 1936, and on that day at the St. Paul market 55 cars of Canadian cattle were received; on April 15, 60 cars were received; and on April 20, 125 cars were received from Canada.

Mr. President, the 143,219 head of cattle which were shipped in from Canada during the year 1936 could not help but have an effect upon the prices of livestock to our own growers. More than that, it would take several thousand acres at least to produce the pasturage and hay and feed to produce those cattle in the United States. Mr. President, when the Agricultural Department has been recommending and had in force under the old Agricultural Adjustment Act a plan to reduce the production of farm commodities in the United States, because we were raising too much, under which plan the acreage was cut down and the Government paid the farmers millions of dollars for cutting down their acreage of farm products, it seems rather strange to me that there should have been negotiated these reciprocal-trade agreements which have resulted in an increased importation of such farm products into the United States.

It seems to me absurd and entirely foolish to spend Government money in that way, because the $1,000,000,000 worth of farm products imported into the United States last year from foreign countries would, if those products had been produced here, have taken out of production thousands of acres of cotton land and thousands of acres of wheat and other grain lands, and in that way cut down the production of the products of which we normally produce a surplus. These imports have increased year by year.

I invite attention to another farm representative who came before the committee, Charles W. Holman, secretary of the National Cooperative Milk Producers' Association. He gave some figures that were very interesting. He told about the increase of agricultural imports during the past few years. He said:

In the first 10 months of last year our imports of agricultural products exceeded our exports by 453.3 percent.

So our trade balance has gone the wrong way under these agreements. Part of that increase is undoubtedly due to drought conditions in this country. Nevertheless, it had the effect of increasing the imports of agricultural products. Only yesterday the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] had read into the RECORD a telegram from the Boston Chamber of Commerce favoring the joint resolution to continue the international trade agreements—why? Because they feel that their business interests are being benefited. Massachusetts is not an agricultural State. It is a manufacturing State. They think they have been getting some benefit from these trade agreements, and probably have.

There is no question, however, according to the representatives of the various farm organizations, that the farmers are getting the short end of the deal. They are being discriminated against perhaps for the benefit of some business interest. I do not blame the Chamber of Commerce of Boston for telegraphing in that way. I would not blame the automobile manufacturers of the great State of Michigan for sending a telegram of that kind, as they probably have. The claim was made, however, when the law was enacted in 1934, that it would be for the benefit of agriculture. That is one positive claim that was made.

Mr. Holman made a number of other statements. He said the amount of cream shipped in had increased. This whole statement is to the effect that agriculture is being discriminated against.

I invite attention also to a statement made by E. H. Everson, the national president of the Farmers Educational and Cooperative Union. He comes from South Dakota. He said:

I wish to call attention to the fact that immediately after our treaty with Canada went into effect the price of cattle on the South St. Paul market went down $1 per hundred, and this at a time when our cattle in that section were forced on the market on account of the drought.

He said the price of cheese also went down 2 or 3 cents a pound after that treaty was made. I think he is correct. He made several other statements along the same line to the effect that the farmers are being discriminated against by these international trade agreements which have been entered into up to date.

Another farm representative who came before the committee was Mr. A. M. Loomis, representing the Association of American Producers of Domestic Inedible Fats, and the National Dairy Union. Mr. Loomis made the same statement—that the farmers are being discriminated against by the international reciprocal-trade agreements. Mr. Loomis spoke of the babassu oil which was mentioned by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] when he was explaining the joint resolution the other day. Mr. Loomis said:

The imports of babassu nuts and kernels free of duty in 1936 amounted to 59,021,600 pounds, every pound competing with a domestic fat or oil product. The processing of this oil in the United States and its commercial uses are on all fours with the processing of palm oil and coconut oil, which is subject to a 3-cent excise or processing tax. This constitutes an arbitrary gratuity to the importers of babassu oil of not less than $1,000,000 during the past calendar year.

Mr. President, that competition, of course, means a good deal to the farmers of America. Mr. Brenckman, secretary of the National Grange, made a statement also in regard to babassu oil. He said that the amount that came in last year replaced 37,400 dairy cows for a whole year. The amount of babassu oil shipped in from South American countries last year had that effect.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FRAZIER. I yield.

Mr. KING. Is it not a fact there was a considerable increase in the number of dairy cows as well as other cattle during the period covered by that shipment, and that the prices, generally speaking, of butter and cheese have increased rather than diminished since the trade agreements have gone into effect?

Mr. FRAZIER. The price of butter has increased to some extent in some instances. Nevertheless, the price still is below what it should be from the standpoint of the farmers to enable them to get cost of production for their products.

Mr. KING. I wondered what became of those 37,000 dairy cows which the Senator stated had been displaced by this small importation of babassu oil. The number of dairy cows has increased, and they are still producing.

Mr. FRAZIER. The record shows we are using more milk and more of other dairy products than we have in the past, and in spite of that fact we are still not up to the point where we should be. There are still children and babies going without milk, especially in the large cities and throughout the drought-stricken regions. The necessary dairy products should be produced here at home. These imports are all in competition with the dairy interests of the United States.

We feel that the farmers are entitled to cost of production for their products and that if any reciprocal-trade agreements are made affecting agricultural products, the tariff should be based on the difference between the cost in the foreign countries where these products originate and the cost of production here at home. That was the provision of the flexible-tariff act. It seems to me the flexible-tariff law was a great deal better from the farmers' standpoint than are the present reciprocal-trade agreements.

The point I want to stress is that, although the Secretary of Agriculture stated before the committee that he thought in these reciprocal-trade agreements the farmers had been given a square deal, every one of the representatives of the farmers and farm organizations who came before the committee has differed with him, and they represent a very large number of farmers. They are representatives of farmers and others in probably every State in the Union, and have all protested against the passage of the joint resolution and against the continuation of the law for another 3 years, unless it is amended, and against the way in which it has worked during the past 2 years.

Mr. President, if it is the farmers who are to be considered, then something should be done to discontinue the international trade agreements, or the law should be amended to provide that Congress shall ratify the agreements before they become effective, and that there shall be open hearings on the subject before an agreement is entered into on behalf of the United States.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], on the day the discussion started on this measure, made the statement—I have not checked up on it, but I take it for granted that it is correct—that in the case of 13 out of the 15 nations that have entered into these agreements with the United States, before the agreement became binding on the foreign country it was ratified by its parliament. That is what has happened in the case of 13 out of 15 of those countries, and that includes the Dominion of Canada, too. Mr. President, if these other nations, before they will finally enter into these agreements, must have the proposed agreements ratified by their parliaments, their lawmaking bodies, why should not the same thing be true here in the United States? It seems to me that it should, by all means; and I hope this measure can be amended at least to provide that the Senate must ratify these agreements, which are nothing more or less than treaties, which the Constitution says must be ratified by the Senate.

Mr. President, I am not going to take up any more time; but it does seem to me that the American agricultural industry has been practically sold out under these agreements. As was so well said yesterday by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], American farmers should have the American market. I believe the Senator from Idaho was absolutely correct in that statement. American farmers are entitled to the American market. We are trying to help them in many ways, among others by paying them to keep down their acreage, to produce less of their products; and, on the other hand, through these trade agreements, we are importing more farm products than we have ever before imported in the history of the United States; and, of course, the imported products come in direct competition with the products raised here at home by our farmers.

The argument was made that the importation of these products will help consumers by bringing down prices; but, as was pointed out yesterday by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN], that has not been the case. The imports undoubtedly have kept down the prices to the farm producers in this country; but the persons who handled those products after they were imported, and after similar products had gone out of the hands of the producers in the United States, manipulated the prices so that they were higher than they had been before, on the ground that imported products cost more money because the importers have to pay a duty on them. It seems to me that the whole argument in favor of this measure falls flat.

I hope the joint resolution will either be defeated or else amended so as to protect our American producers.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, during the past few days we have heard some very able discussions relative to the reciprocal trade agreement measure pending before the Senate. The matter has been very thoroughly gone into, and for that reason I shall make my remarks very brief.

I believe there are certain outstanding facts concerning reciprocal trade agreements which we should bear in mind at this time. We are extending to the Executive broad powers—powers concerning tariff making, treaty making, and taxation.

I believe there is a grave constitutional question whether we, as a Congress, have the power to transfer those duties to the Chief Executive of the Nation without limitation or condition.

I believe that if we are to transfer those powers to the Chief Executive, we should set up certain standards and certain restrictions in the measure under consideration. For example, I believe there should be in this proposed legislation a mandatory requirement for the calling of a public hearing some time in advance of the final negotiation or framing of a treaty. I believe there should be a mandatory requirement that announcement should be publicly made of the commodities under consideration some time in advance of their consideration. I believe that the negotiations should not be conducted in secret, without giving an opportunity to be heard to the American public who are vitally affected by the proposed agreements. I believe that when a public hearing is held it should be held by the same agency that is negotiating the treaty, rather than, as is now the case, by a committee that has nothing to do with the actual negotiation of the treaty.

I believe that the rates to be established on the various commodities under consideration in the various treaties should be based on the American cost of production of the commodities. I know that in the section from which I come—northern New England—the so-called Canadian reciprocal agreement worked a hardship on many of the producers of my section. I know that in certain instances, at least, the industries and the individuals affected had no advance notice of the pendency of negotiations regarding the commodities in which they were interested, and for that reason could not appear and present the facts relating to the problems they were confronting in their particular industry, and in turn protect themselves from unfair competition. In my opinion, treaties negotiated under this act should be subject to ratification by the United States Senate, just as in the case of any other treaties.

I am not opposed to the policy of real reciprocity; I am not opposed to the general principles which are embodied in this proposed legislation; but I am opposed to granting this power to the President of the United States without restriction and without limitation. I am opposed to giving him a blank check to sign, and having that blank check possibly affect the very lifeblood of our industries and the employees in those industries.

For that reason, unless the joint resolution is amended as a result of amendments to be proposed by certain of my colleagues, I shall vote against it. I believe this joint resolution should be amended first so as to make mandatory the public announcement of commodities under consideration some time in advance. I believe there should be a mandatory requirement for a public hearing, to be held before the agency that negotiates the treaty as to all commodities on which the producers care to be heard. I believe the joint resolution should be amended so that the commodities which are the basis of import negotiations should be prohibited for import at a price below the cost of American production of the commodities. I believe the joint resolution should be amended so as to provide for ratification of these treaties by the United States Senate, as all other treaties must be ratified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] whether any other Member on his side of the Chamber wishes to discuss this subject?

Mr. MCNARY. Yes, Mr. President; the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] wishes to discuss the constitutional features of the matter. He is the only other speaker who expects to make an extended address. I think he is willing to have the pending amendment disposed of at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG].

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I ask to have the amendment stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the proper place in the joint resolution it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That after the enactment of this joint resolution no trade agreement shall include any provison in any way undertaking to limit the power of Congress over internal taxes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I offer another amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the proper place in the joint resolution it is proposed to add the following:

Provided, That after the enactment of this resolution no proclamation shall be made reducing or otherwise changing any statutory duty on foreign imports below the amount necessary, as found by the United States Tariff Commission, to equalize the American cost of production of like or similar domestic commodities.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG obtained the floor.

Mr. MCNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LEWIS. I reannounce the absence of certain Senators as announced by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON] on the former roll call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCHWELLENBACH in the chair). Eighty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the pending amendment is self-explanatory, and I shall say but a word in connection with it.

When Dr. Sayre appeared before the committee he said that the only rates of duty which he proposed at any time to reduce by agreement were duties which were exorbitant or excessive. I am now offering an amendment which merely requires that no rate shall be reduced below the American cost of production, and I fail to believe that any Senator is going to assert that a rate which covers the American cost of production as found by expert authority is an exorbitant or extravagant rate. The pending amendment does nothing except prohibit a reduction of a rate below the cost of production as found by the United States Tariff Commission.

If a Senator votes against this amendment, he closes the door upon ever logically complaining if the gentlemen at the other end of the Avenue slaughter agriculture in his area, or put some industry on the chopping block. That is happening now because the rule of the cost of production is not being followed.

It must be remembered that these agreements still are made in secret. While the process of notification has been somewhat revised as a concession to the tremendous complaints that rolled up from one end of the country to the other against the previous method obtaining, the fact is that the American producer, the American farmer, the American industrialist, whoever he may be, never knows what has happened to him in the State Department until the negotiations have proceeded beyond recall, until the decision has been made beyond the possibility of reopening it. I respectfully submit that somewhere along the line American agriculture and American industry are entitled at least to the minimum protection that they shall not be ravished below the American cost of production.

I have heard only one objection made to this amendment, and I know of only one objection that can be urged against it, unless Senators are willing to permit Dr. Sayre, Dr. Mordecai Ezekiel, and other gentlemen, to reduce these rates below the American cost of production. I repeat I know of only one reason that can be urged against this amendment, and I do not think that is a sound reason; I think it is an excuse. At any rate, it is said that the cost of production abroad is difficult to determine in these fluid economic days. Very well. I call attention to the fact that this amendment is so worded that it is unnecessary to determine the cost of production abroad. The only thing that is necessary is to determine the American cost of production, the cost at home, under the rule the United States Tariff Commission has been following every day of the year, and then to apply that cost of production to the landed cost of the import, and to tie the hands of the negotiators against reducing the differential below the point which permits American agriculture and American industry to survive.

There is no difficulty about finding the cost of production at home, even though it is a fluctuating matter, because the United States Tariff Commission has the 5-year average rule, which it uses all the time. The United States Tariff Commission ruled upon five major commodities in 1936 under the elastic clause of the tariff law, found the cost of production, and protected it under the necessary mandate of that law. But in respect to every other commodity which was touched in these trade agreements during the last 2 years there was no such protection; the American standard was frequently invaded and destroyed, and I am submitting that from now on, in the face of the protests from agriculture and industry, the least the Congress can do by way of reclaiming its own constitutional authority, by way of asserting a rule of conduct for these negotiators, is to insist that the American cost of production shall not be invaded.

I call attention to the fact that when the spokesmen for the dairy interests of America appeared before the Finance Committee the one thing above everything else they plead for was a rule of this character, to assure them against trades which would invade the American cost of agriculturad production.

Mr. President, this is all I have to say, except that I desire to have a roll call on the amendment, if I may be permitted to have it, because I want to know who says that the American cost of production shall not be preserved in connection with these international contracts.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, if there is any amendment that would nullify the high purposes of the proposed legislation or hamper those who are negotiating these trade agreements it would be the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan.

We have had discussions here for years regarding this cost-of-production idea. Senators know that one farmer can produce cotton or wheat or corn at a certain figure and that the cost to another farmer will be entirely different. If the pending amendment should be agreed to, it would not only apply to the competing country which produces the competitive article but it would apply to every other country in the world. Of course, the idea of cost of production enters into the consideration given to the question by the negotiators whenever concessions are given or concessions are asked, but I sincerely hope that we will not hamstring this legislation by including in it a provision that the negotiators, before they can make a trade agreement, must send here and there, abroad and at home, to ascertain the cost of production. In some cases it might take 2 years to ascertain the cost of production of some items, and such delay would nullify the whole purpose of the proposed legislation.

Mr. President, we are asking an extension of the Trade Agreement Act for only 3 years, and that whole time, in some instances, may elapse before the cost of production in certain circumstances can be ascertained.

I hope that the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. McNARY and Mr. VANDENBERG called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered on Mr. VANDENBERG'S amendment, which reads, as follows:

Provided, That after the enactment of this resolution, no proclamation shall be made reducing or otherwise changing any statutory duty on foreign imports below the amount necessary, as found by the United States Tariff Commission, to equalize the American cost of production of like or similar domestic commodities.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HATCH (when Mr. ASHURST'S name was called). I have been requested to announce that the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] is unavoidably detained, and that if present he would vote "nay" on this question.

Mr. McNARY (when Mr. HALE'S name was called). The senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] is necessarily absent. He has a pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES]. If present and at liberty to vote, the Senator from Maine would vote "yea", and I am advised that the Senator from South Carolina would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. I announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. DONAHEY] is detained from the Senate on account of illness.

So the amendment of Mr. VANDENBERG was rejected.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the pending joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 1, line 8, it is proposed to strike out the period, insert a semicolon, and add the following:

Section 2 of the act entitled "An act to amend the Tariff Act of 1930", approved June 12, 1934, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(d) No foreign trade agreement hereafter entered into under section 1 of this act shall take effect until it shall have been ratified by the Senate of the United States with the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators present."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire briefly to submit some comments in regard to the amendment. I shall vote for it, although it does not represent the procedure which should obtain as to trade agreements. It is better than not to have any consideration in Congress at all, but the so-called trade agreements, in my opinion, are legislative measures and should originate in the other House and be considered by Congress.

Mr. President, as I see it, there can be only three categories into which these agreements can possibly fall. They are either executive agreements or legislative acts or treaties. I do not know of any other category into which they can possibly fall. I should be happy to have any other category mentioned. If they are executive agreements, there is no occasion and no justification on the part of the Congress to legislate in regard to them at all. The President may undoubtedly negotiate, within certain lines, agreements which are executive in character. It is a power which belongs to him by virtue of his position and which is given to him by the Constitution. We cannot take it away and we cannot add to it. He does not need legislation; he derives his power from the Constitution.

I do not know of any agreement which the President may make as an executive agreement which could possibly call for legislative action; but certainly if the agreement is not in the executive category, it must fall either within the legislative authority or the treaty-making power. In my opinion, it is a legislative prerogative. The Congress would have the power and the right to pass a law providing for the making of such agreements and specify the rule or the standard which should guide the negotiator in making the agreements. If we should undertake to deal with the subject as a legislative matter, it would involve our fixing a rule or standard or formula for the President, guiding or governing him in the making of the agreements. That seems to me to be the proper way to proceed. Then comes the question of the treaty-making power which is involved in the pending amendment.

It has been supposed and it has been contended that the decision in the Embargo case fully justifies these agreements. I do not so understand the Embargo case; in fact, I do not think that it has any bearing upon these agreements whatever. The joint resolution upon which the Court passed in the Embargo case read as follows:

That if the President finds the prohibition of sale of arms and munitions of war in the United States to those countries now engaged in armed conflict in the Chaco may contribute to the reestablishment of peace between those countries, and if, after consultation with the governments of other American republics and with their cooperation, as well as that of such other governments as he may deem necessary, he makes proclamation to that effect, it shall be unlawful to sell, except under such limitations and exceptions as the President prescribes, any arms or munitions of war in any place in the United States to the countries now engaged in that armed conflict, or to any person, company, or association acting in the interest of either country until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress.

That is the resolution upon which the Court was passing, and which the Court held to be valid. But the Court said in passing upon this matter:

Whether, if the joint resolution had related solely to internal affairs, it would be open to the challenge that it constituted an unlawful delegation of legislative power to the Executive we find it unnecessary to determine. The whole aim of the resolution is to affect a situation entirely external to the United States and falling within the category of foreign affairs. The determination which we are called to make, therefore, is whether the joint resolution, as applied to that situation, is vulnerable to attack under the rule that forbids a delegation of the lawmaking power. In other words, assuming (but not deciding) that the challenged delegation, if it were confined to internal affairs, would be invalid, may it nevertheless be sustained on the ground that its exclusive aim is to afford a remedy for a hurtful condition within foreign territory.

It seems to me that that is a wholly different proposition from dealing with a matter which does concern the internal affairs of the United States.

We are dealing with a matter which, while it connects with a foreign country, also has to do with the interests and welfare of the citizens of the United States. No one would contend that these trade agreements have to do solely with the interests of foreign governments. We have not quite reached that admission. They are agreements which involve also our local concerns. Thus, I do not think that decision has any bearing upon this particular matter.

However, the Supreme Court, in its decision and in the argument leading up to its conclusion, refers to the fact that the President might make certain agreements and among other decisions which it cited was the case of Field against Clark. The Court cited the case of Field against Clark not in disapproval but in approval. What does the case of Field against Clark decide? It decides that when the President is making these agreements or negotiating these understandings with foreign nations he must act under a rule, a regulation, or a specification of conduct prescribed by the Congress itself. There is nothing in the case of Field against Clark which even indicates that the President may proceed of his own discretion without regard to a rule laid down by the Congress; in fact, the Court decided specifically in the case of Field against Clark that the Congress cannot delegate its power in this matter and that the only way under which the President may act, and act authoritatively, is to act under a rule prescribed by the Congress itself.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. Before the Senator gets entirely away from the Embargo case, let me say that I understood the Senator to say that that case related to an entirely different matter from that which we are considering now because the agreements which we have under consideration now affect us internally while the Embargo case did not affect us internally. I do not exactly understand how that could be for embargo or prohibition of the exportation of goods did apply perhaps to the people of the United States as well as to those of foreign nations. It interfered with their business; it gave an opportunity to increase prices, and it denied our citizens who produce the articles in this country an opportunity to sell in foreign markets. So it seems to me that the embargo case did affect our people internally as well as externally.

Mr. BORAH. There may be something in the Senator's contention. I was reading, however, the basis upon which the Court rested its opinion, and the Court said in its opinion:

In other words, assuming (but not deciding) that the challenged delegation, if it were confined to the internal affairs, would be invalid, it may nevertheless be sustained on the ground that its exclusive aim is to afford a remedy for a hurtful condition within foreign territory.

It might be that the Senator and I would agree that it did affect the interest of this country, but the Court took the view that its exclusive aim was to deal with the matter in foreign countries, and upon that basis it rendered its opinion. The opinion cannot be cited as an authority upon any other state of facts than those assumed by the Court as the basis for its opinion.

Mr. LOGAN. That appears to be so; but, of course, in the nature of the circumstances, the embargo could not exclusively affect other countries. It seems that the Court took the view that the Embargo case only affected the people of other countries. I do not think that would be true in either case, but the Court seems to have said so in the Embargo case.

Mr. BORAH. I was citing the Embargo case because of the fact that it has been contended that the Embargo case makes these reciprocal-trade agreements valid. My contention is that it has no application to the trade agreements because the facts are the reverse of the facts which the Court assumed for its conclusions.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not think that is true. I think the reasoning of the Embargo case might be as well applied to this case as the circumstances involved in the Embargo case are the same. Perhaps there is something wrong about it, but the same opinion might apply to one just about as well as to the other.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I interrupt the Senator from Idaho to call for his reconsideration of a statement which I think he did not intend to make. First, the Senator will recall that he and myself exchanged our views upon the question of these contracts, I insisting that it was within the power of the Executive right to make the contracts, and my able friend, to the contrary, insisting that they were treaties, as he thought, which were being made by government with government, and would, therefore, have to be ratified.

I had occasion, speaking to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] touching his very able presentation as to the power of delegation, to say that the case of Field against Clark really decided that the President had the right to make the agreements as provided in the tariff act. My able friend from Idaho, unless I misunderstood him, said the Supreme Court decided he did not have the power.

Mr. BORAH. He had the power, but he had it only under a specified rule and standard fixed by the Congress. The Court specifically decided that without that standard and without that rule the President did not have the power to make the agreement. The Senator and I are not in disagreement, I am sure, as to what the opinion holds. I shall read a part of it. The opinion says:

That Congress cannot delegate legislative power to the President is a principle universally recognized as vital to the integrity and maintenance of the system of government ordained by the Constitution. Nothing involving the expediency or just operation of such legislation was left to the determination of the President.

In other words, the Congress specified certain duties with reference to the importation of certain articles then upon the free list. That was in the law. That was a part of the established law. Then it was provided that in case the President ascertained certain facts, another set of duties should go into operation upon the President declaring that state of facts. That is all there was in the case of Field against Clark. The President was acting as the agent and representative of the Congress of the United States to ascertain the fact of whether these foreign countries were dealing fairly and reciprocally with the United States, and if he declared they were not, then the law itself went into operation and not the declaration of the President as to rates.

Mr. LEWIS. Does not the Senator see some parallel in the statement of the Court in that case to the power granted, in the power given in the present treaties now before this body?

Mr. BORAH. I do not see the parallel. I would be glad to have the Senator state the parallel.

Mr. LEWIS. It is my judgment that the parallel lies in the fact that by legislation we granted the President the right to make these treaties. I will have the Senator to understand that I do not concur in the suggestion that we can abdicate our duty to ratify any compact that in truth is a treaty, and were this proposition now an original undertaking and we were now for the first time considering it I would be opposed to the theory that undertakings of this kind in the form of a treaty could possibly exist without the ratification of the Senate. I deny that the Senate has the right to surrender its duty to ratify treaties and I deny the fact that the compact becomes a treaty until the Senate ratifies it.

But having gone into the proceeding my position is, making the parallel which I suggested to the able Senator, that Congress has given the power to the President to make these treaties and therefore to adjust and adjudge the situation of a foreign country and ourselves. In that case we have the parallel to the privilege laid down in the case which my able friend and myself have cited and with which we are both acquainted.

I may say also that I do not agree with Field against Clark. I think the able court got very wrong and very far afield from the correct principles of government, and laid down the beginning of a very bad and wrongful policy; but since it is the law that if we have the right to delegate these congressional duties to the President it is therefore done and affirmed, affirmed and announced by that act, I insist the decision affords a parallel which justifies the position of the chairman of the Committee on Finance in opposing the amendment of the able Senator from Kansas. I oppose the opinion as law, but follow it as authority.

Mr. BORAH. Let us consider the question of parallel for a moment. In the act which the Court passed upon in Field against Clark, the law in itself was complete. The rates were established. The conditions upon which they were to operate were provided. The only thing that the President was authorized to do was to ascertain a state of facts, and, when he ascertained that state of facts, to so announce by proclamation, and then the law went into operation as the Congress had provided.

In my opinion, that is not true here in any sense. The President is given unlimited power, without any rule or specification of principle by which to be guided in the making of rates or the kind of rates or the nature of duties, to make these agreements. The matter is entirely within his hands. Congress does not undertake to specify—in fact, has just recently refused to specify—that he shall even be guided by the rule of cost of production at home and abroad. It specifies no rule whatever. It is a delegation of legislative power. We need not be in error as to what we are doing. The President is not making Executive agreements and we are not making treaties. What we are doing is delegating in wholesale and riotous fashion legislative power. The very fact that we are legislating shows conclusively that this is not a treaty matter nor a matter of Executive agreements. It is a legislative matter and we are granting to the President legislative power. We fix no rule, no standard, no formula.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point for a suggestion?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. STEIWER. The distinguished Senator from Illinois, referring to the case of Field against Clark, if I understood him correctly, was proceeding on the theory that there was something novel about that decision. He expressed his disagreement with it.

It has been some time since I read the decision, but at one time I studied it very carefully and it is my recollection, which the Senator can confirm or correct, that in that case the Supreme Court merely applied the rule of general acceptation, a rule recognized both in England and America, and one which has been declared in the State courts of many of the States. The opinion specifically quoted, as I recall, from a decision handed down by the Supreme Court of the State of Ohio. There is nothing novel about the rule and nothing exceptional. It is the settled, accepted rule, and has been, I should say, for something like 75 years or more.

Mr. BORAH. I agree with both Senators. The principle which is announced by the Court, of course, is not novel. The application of that principle, in my judgment, was novel in that case. I think the Court went to the utmost limit in sustaining the delegation of power in that instance, and when they decided the Hampton case, using Field against Clark as a precedent, they sustained another delegation of power which has never appealed to me as a sound delegation of power. I do not cite either case because I agree with it. They are both bad law. I cite them, however, to show that, even bad law as they contain, they do not go anywhere near the distance we are going now.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. I ask the Senator to consider the following language in the Tariff Act of 1934 to which allusion must be made, if to any language, in attempting to find a standard, namely:

> The President, whenever he finds as a fact that any existing duties or other import restrictions of the United States or any foreign country are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States and that the purposes above declared will be promoted by the means hereinafter specified, is authorized from time to time to enter into foreign trade agreements with foreign governments or instrumentalities thereof—

And so forth.

I ask the Senator, on any interpretation of that language, can one find a rule or standard laid down by the Congress by which to measure the amount of duties that should be charged or by which to ascertain what the terms of import restrictions are to be following that rule?

Mr. BORAH. I do not think there is any definite rule, and I do not think there was any rule in the Hampton case.

So far as I am concerned, I am not preaching any new doctrine. I think the last tariff act which we passed was a clear delegation of legislative power; and we are constantly, step by step, moving along that line. I opposed that delegation of power. I oppose this delegation of power because, in my opinion, it is wholly outside of any authority which may exercise in regard to it.

But, Mr. President, I do not wish to get away from this particular matter, and I do not wish to detain the Senate more than a moment longer, because I am satisfied the Senate is anxious to vote. My contention is that we must either treat this as an Executive agreement, in which case the Congress has nothing to do with it—it is a matter solely within the power of the President—or we must treat it as a legislative act, in which case we must lay down the rule and fix the standard by which the President is to be guided, or we must consider it as a treaty, in which case it must come back to the Senate for ratification.

I do not know of any category under which a trade agreement can fall if it does not fall in one of those three; and I do not know of any authority we have to control the President in making executive agreements. Does anybody know of such authority? Does Congress have to legislate in order that the President may discharge his executive duties with reference to making executive agreements? If we should do so, and we should undertake to limit his power in any respect whatever, he would pay no attention to our action. He has such power as the Constitution gives him to make certain classes of agreements which are executive agreements; but when we make a contract with a nation which binds that nation and binds us, which is a contract between sovereign powers, which is the law of the land so far as the United States is concerned, it measures up in every respect to the dignity of a treaty, and we must either regard it as such or else we must deal with it in a legislative way. I see no excuse from the conclusion that these agreements are legislation or treaties. I feel confident they fall within the legislative domain.

My reason for insisting that we should deal with this matter in a legislative way is that there can be no doubt but that we are dealing here with a question of revenue. There can be no doubt but that we are dealing here with a question of taxes and of revenue. Senators know, one king lost his head and another lost his crown because of trying to take away from Parliament the power to control the revenues of the country. If there was anything which the fathers understood and which they undertook to do, it was to see that the whole power to deal with revenue, with taxes, was in the Congress of the United States, and exclusively in the Congress. The fathers even went so far as to provide that bills touching this subject must originate in that body which is elected every 2 years, in order to keep the entire subject close to the taxpayers of the United States. I would deal with it upon that basis rather than upon the basis of a treaty, although I will vote for a proposal to deal with the matter in the form of a treaty because, in my opinion, in some way Congress, or part of it, ought to be heard upon this question. But it is not the proper and constitutional way. And it is not the way to best protect the interests of the producers of this country.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I rise merely because of one question that has been injected into the discussion, and that is whether the act which is sought to be extended falls within the category of a treaty or an Executive agreement.

I think that in the case of Field against Clark, to which reference has been made, the distinction between a treaty and an Executive agreement is very well drawn. Indeed, it is not merely drawn in that case, but it is very well restated in that case.

A treaty can change existing law. In fact, a treaty, when ratified by two-thirds vote of the Senate, becomes a part of the supreme law of the land. A treaty, therefore, can supersede, can override, can change an existing congressional act.

An Executive agreement cannot change statutory law. In other words, the President, within the field in which he is authorized to negotiate an Executive agreement with a foreign government, is bound by existing law. He cannot override it; he cannot supersede it; he cannot contradict it by anything he puts into his Executive agreement.

That, as I understand, is the fundamental difference between an Executive agreement, in the field in which the Executive may act for the General Government, and a treaty, which, of course, must be ratified by the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, am I to understand the Senator from Georgia to contend that the President has no power to make executive agreements except as he derives it from some authority of Congress?

Mr. GEORGE. No; I do not make that contention. Upon that point I agree exactly with the Senator from Idaho. The Executive has the power to make an executive agreement, but in that agreement he is bound by the existing law of the land, and he cannot override it. That is very clearly recognized in the case of Field against Clark, in One Hundred and Forty-third United States Reports.

The only reason why this trade agreement measure is here is that by the law of the land certain duties upon certain imports are fixed; in other words, in our tariff act we have fixed the schedule and have fixed the rate of duty; and, therefore, the President could enter into no negotiations with any foreign government which would lower or raise by a hair's breadth the duty fixed by Congress, unless Congress gave him the power in the act now before it. That is the only reason why this measure was brought here in the first instance, and it is the only reason why it is here now.

Upon the still more troublesome question whether or not the act by which we seek to give the President the power to negotiate trade agreements is an unlawful delegation of legislative power, I very frankly said in the debates upon this subject, when we had under consideration the original act, that the question was one upon which I did not care to dogmatize, because it is an exceedingly close and difficult one; but, in view of the decision in Field against Clark, which, it is true, passed upon the power of the President to put in effect rates fixed by the Congress—the President was nevertheless given the broad discretion that whenever he determined it to be in the public interest—as broad and as genial as the encasing air—he might put into effect the new rates that were fixed by the Congress itself.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. STEIWER. As I recall the statute which was under consideration in that case, it used the word "deems." It said, in effect, that whenever the President "deems" that discriminatory practices are being resorted to by foreign countries, he may do a certain thing; and my recollection is that the Court considered the use of that word, and interpreted it to mean "finds"; so they read the statute to mean, when the President finds a certain fact.

If I am in error about that, I should like to be corrected.

Mr. GEORGE. I think the Senator is correct.

Mr. STEIWER. If I am correct, then how can the Senator from Georgia say that the President was given a broad discretion? He was required to find either one way or the other, consistent with the fact.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. STEIWER. A fact is quite different from a discretion.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; but the fact which he was authorized to find was, after all, the matter within his discretion, in my judgment. I have conceded that the point is a close one; but, based upon the authority in the Field case, and then if the Hampden case in Two Hundred and Seventy-sixth United States Reports be accepted, I do not see how we can escape the conclusion that the broad general power given the President in this particular act can be held to be an unlawful delegation of legislative power.

The only point upon which legislation is needed in order to authorize the President to make an Executive agreement with a foreign nation respecting commerce between the United States and that foreign nation is the power of the President to lower or raise, for the purposes of negotiating his agreement, the existing tariff rates. In the Hampden case it is true that the Court laid great stress upon the fact that a formula which was at least theoretically capable of exact application was laid down; but Chief Justice Taft in that case first announced the broad general principle that if an intelligible principle was laid down by the Congress for the guidance of the Executive, then the power delegated to the Executive to lower or raise tariff duties 50 percent was not an unlawful delegation of legislative power.

But I take great comfort in a line of cases which I think it is too late to overthrow, whatever may be said concerning those cases in point of theory or upon principle.

I think that if one reads carefully the power which the Congress gave to the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix just freight rates, and to regulate charges for carrying passengers and freight, he is bound to reach the conclusion that there is not laid down an exact, meticulous formula such as the Supreme Court itself undertook to say did exist in the tariff act considered by that Court in the Hampden case. Of course, the Court there had under consideration section 315 of the Tariff Act of 1922, which is substantially, though not precisely, the provision carried in the Tariff Act of 1930 in section 336.

The point is that if there is no unlawful delegation of legislative power to lower the rate upon an article of import, or to increase it, then the act must be, of course, taken as a valid act, and it answers the inquiry raised here, because it is essential to the power of the Executive to negotiate an Executive agreement that he act in accordance with a valid act of the land, and not contrary to it; and he cannot negotiate the treaties which we gave him the power in 1934 to negotiate unless this measure be passed by the Congress, and, of course, unless it be subsequently held by the Court that the Congress in passing it has not undertaken to make an unlawful delegation of legislative power.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. With great respect to the Senator's judgment, may I inquire of him whether he thinks Congress delegated to the Executive, through trade agreements, the power to abrogate or suspend other treaties?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not. I am not now discussing whether or not that has been done, because I have not examined into that; but if that has been done in any particular agreement, say, between the United States and Brazil, or the United States and any other nation with respect to matters other than import duties, then that agreement partakes of the character of a treaty, and before it can be effective it must be ratified by a two-thirds vote of the Senate.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I thank the Senator.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. KING. I know what the Senator from Michigan has in mind. It seems to me, however, that an agreement of that character might be dual and could be divided—that the part of it which sought to supersede an existing treaty might be held to be unconstitutional and yet the residue of it be absolutely valid.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, the challenge to me—and I am sure the Senator would agree—is less the thing that is done than the willingness of the State Department to go to such an extent in the interpretation of the delegation of power.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not think that in this act we undertook to delegate to the President the power to abrogate an existing treaty with respect to any matter other than import duties. I do not discuss whether any such treaty has been abrogated, or to what extent it would, of course, convert the agreement into a treaty; but it seems to me perfectly clear that if a treaty existing between the United States and any other country has, in fact, been abrogated by one of the so-called reciprocal-trade agreements with respect to any matter other than import duties, then that particular agreement partakes of the character of a treaty and must itself be ratified as provided in the Constitution.

Mr. BORAH. Just a word, Mr. President. It is rather interesting to me to know just where we are arriving with reference to this question. The Senator from Georgia made it very clear that, from his viewpoint, the President could not act in this matter without legislative authority; that he could not make one of these agreements without legislative authority. It is conceded, I suppose, on all hands, that Congress may abrogate a treaty by an act of legislation; and if Congress may abrogate a treaty by act of legislation, may not Congress delegate to the President, if it can delegate at all, the authority to make a so-called trade agreement which abrogates a treaty?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I am not debating the question which the Senator raises, that we might have given the President authority to modify or abrogate a treaty; but I do not think the act undertook to do that. I have conceded that in order for the President to negotiate a trade agreement which would be valid, there must be a delegation of authority to him to lower or raise an existing tariff rate. The only question in my mind is whether there has been an unlawful delegation of legislative power, or whether we have laid down in the legislation considered a rule that does come within the cases decided by the Supreme Court. We laid down, I frankly confess, a very broad rule; and fundamentally, of course, it simply gives to the President, when he finds that he can thereby increase the commerce of the United States, the power to enter into reciprocal-trade agreements and to affect existing rates. Whether or not the act is a valid one depends upon whether we have made an unlawful delegation of legislative power; and that, in turn, under our cases, depends upon whether or not we have laid down any sufficient criterion, or rule, or formula to guide and govern the Executive in making his decision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER].

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may not the amendment be stated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed, on page 1, line 8, to strike out the period, to insert a semicolon, and to add the following:

Section 2 of the act entitled "An act to amend the Tariff Act of 1930", approved June 12, 1934, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(d) No foreign-trade agreement hereafter entered into under section 1 of this act shall take effect until it shall have been ratified by the Senate of the United States with the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators present."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the debate, very interesting though it has been, has been really on the merits of the joint resolution itself, and not upon the pending amendment. It is interesting to note, in passing, that two great Senators have differed with the Supreme Court of the United States in two distinct cases. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] does not agree with the Supreme Court in the case of Field against Clark, and said so very courageously and very bravely. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], equally learned in the law, does not agree with the Supreme Court in the so-called Hampden case. So, Mr. President, whither are we drifting? [Laughter.]

I suppose that if in the end it turns out that the Trade Agreements Act itself is unconstitutional, and that the President, acting under it, violates the Constitution on the ground that he is exercising authority which we had no right to give him, the Supreme Court, acting either in its judicial capacity or in its legislative capacity, or both, will rectify the evil, and everything will be lovely some day.

As to the particular amendment now pending, I can see how anyone could support it if he wants the joint resolution defeated. As I see it, if the pending amendment should be adopted, we might just as well reject the whole proposal. As I look at it, the adoption of the pending amendment would be the death knell of the joint resolution.

So far as the Supreme Court will allow us to delegate power to anybody, to the Tariff Commission, the President, or both of them put together, I feel friendly toward the delegation of authority to them to go as far as they can go in making tariff laws, because God knows, and every Senator knows, that the Congress of the United States, from the very nature of things, cannot make a scientific tariff law. The Congress has been trying to do that ever since the country was born, and it has never made a scientific tariff law yet.

It is perfectly foolish, it seems to me, to expect 500 or 550 men to consider the tariff, comprising several thousand items, all different, to a great degree, and enact a law which in the end will be as near a perfect law as 25 men or a lesser number could make, or as nearly perfect as a scientific commission, such as our Tariff Commission, enabled to conduct proper investigations, could make. So, whether right or wrong, I have always felt that we proceeded in the direction of efficiency when we delegated as much power as we could to the Tariff Commission and the President to rectify the evils which creep into every tariff law, made by two different legislative bodies, composed of a large number of men. I may be entirely wrong about that, but it seems to me that while the trade-agreements legislation is not perfect by any means it is a step in that direction. Therefore I favor this so-called delegation of authority to rectify and modify our tariff acts. I believe it tends toward more efficient government. The pending amendment, however, if agreed to, will require the President to submit to the Senate every trade agreement he makes; and we will take it up and debate it without limitation of time, and must ratify it by a two-thirds majority in order to make it effective. If we are going to do that we had better not attempt to do anything along this line, as I see it, and had better simply defeat the joint resolution.

Believing, as I do, that more efficient government is achieved by having this power delegated as we have tried to delegate it than without such delegation, I should not vote for any amendment which I believed would destroy the very life of the law itself. Believing that the proposed amendment would do that, I cannot see how anyone who believes in the law can vote for the pending amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, before the Senator from Nebraska takes his seat I wish to recall to his mind that in the Dingley tariff law, written by the party of the opposition on the other side of the Chamber, there was contained such a provision as the one now proposed, except that its application was limited to certain products. Under the Dingley law that power was delegated to the President.

Mr. NORRIS. As I read my history, I think that is true, although it happened quite a good many years ago. It was before I became active in senatorial matters—before my day, in other words. So I do not remember fully what the circumstances were at the time referred to by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I rise merely to say that if every reciprocal-trade agreement must be made into a treaty and disposed of as treaties are disposed of, it would make impossible the operation of the program for improving our commercial relations with foreign nations and for rebuilding and reestablishing the foreign trade of the United States. As has well been said by the Senator who preceded me, with the rule of unlimited debate applicable, and the disposition that always manifests itself to invoke that rule when economic issues of importance are involved, it would take an entire session of the Congress for the Senate to ratify one, two, or three of these trade agreements.

I think it has been demonstrated with reasonable certainty that it is proper for the Congress to give this authority to the President, and I am sure it has resulted in wholesome benefits to the general interests of this Nation, to the welfare and the progress of our people, and to the reestablishment of our commerce with foreign peoples.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] on page 1, line 8.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, in line with the statement which I made regarding the pending measure on Tuesday of this week, I now send to the desk an amendment which undertakes to abrogate the power of the executive branch to incorporate in trade agreements the most-favored-nation clause. I ask that the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 1, line 8, it is proposed to strike out the period and insert a colon and the following:

Provided, That (a) so much of paragraph "(2)" of subsection (a) of section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, as reads "The proclaimed duties and other import restrictions shall apply to articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of all foreign countries, whether imported directly or indirectly" is amended to read as follows: "The duties and other import restrictions proclaimed with respect to any agreement entered into under this section after June 12, 1934, shall apply only to articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the foreign country with which the agreement is entered into."

(b) This section shall take effect 60 days after the date of the enactment of this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I call up my amendment, which is lying on the desk, and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the proper place in the joint resolution it is proposed to insert the following:

Every proclamation of the President under this act shall be submitted to the Congress while in session, and shall not become effective until the expiration of 30 calendar days after such submission unless Congress, by a majority vote of both Houses, provide for an earlier effective date of such proclamation: Provided, That if Congress shall adjourn before the expiration of 30 calendar days from the date of such submission, such proclamation shall not be effective until after the expiration of 30 calendar days from the opening day of the next succeeding regular or special session.

LET THE PEOPLE KNOW

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, if there had been a roll call upon the amendment offered a few moments ago by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] requiring ratification of trade agreements entered into under the authority of this measure by a two-thirds vote, I should have voted against the proposal, and I desire the RECORD to show that I was opposed to it. I agree with the arguments which have been offered here that any requirement of ratification would have made it altogether impossible to hope for any successful development of the program of reciprocal agreements.

The amendment which I now offer, however, is designed to obtain the same effect without the defects which were inherent in the amendment of the Senator from Kansas. Not argument and debate but public knowledge of what is being done before it has been accomplished is the objective of this amendment.

It is the identical one which I offered in this body when the Trade Agreements Act was first under consideration 3 years ago. It was not adopted at that time. But it seems to me that in all reason, in all principle, and from a perfectly practical point of view it ought to be adopted now. That the Senate and the House are now delegating to a department of the Government the power to change the tariff rates is, of course, apparent to anyone who reads the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act and the resolution continuing it. No one, it seems to me, can deny that that power is a legislative function.

SENATE'S OBLIGATIONS

Those of us who sit in this body representing the several States are under an obligation to represent the people of our States and to protect them in all the legislative functions of the Government, and particularly to protect them in the levying of taxes and the fixing of tariff rates. Nothing can be more important to the people of the States than the tariff system under which the Nation operates. We all know that great industries have been built up by the exercise of the tariff power. We know that industries can be torn down by the exercise of the tariff power.

Yet under this bill as it was originally drawn and as we are now asked to vote for it, every Senator in this body completely surrenders the power to protect the citzens and the industries of his State that may be affected by tariff rates to be modified by the State Department under this bill.

I can give a very clear example of what I have in mind. When this act was originally adopted, all through the western part of this country, stockmen and ranchmen were worried about whether or not they would be able to continue to operate. Overproduction of livestock was the rule. Prices of livestock had tobogganed, the market for livestock products had been tremendously narrowed, the financial condition of ranchers and stockmen throughout the West, and, for that matter, throughout the country, was so bad that as one of the emergency measures of this administration we created the Farm Credit Administration to extend to these farmers and ranchmen the financial assistance of the Federal Government. We made loans on ranches. We made loans on livestock. We granted commissioner loans. We granted loans when the security to be offered was far below—I almost might say—what common sense would demand of any loaning agency, but we authorized that type of loan because we had faith that it would help to pull the country out of the depression. We had faith that it would enable the stockmen and the ranchers to redeem themselves, to put themselves again on a firm financial footing. We undertook to purchase cattle and sheep under the drought program for the purpose of eliminating the surplus supplies from the markets, and of maintaining the prices at the ranches and to the producers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Wyoming will suspend for a moment, the hour of 3 o'clock having arrived, the Chair desires to call the attention of the Senate to the unanimous-consent agreement entered into yesterday which provides that after the hour of 3 o'clock this afternoon no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 30 minutes on the joint resolution or longer than 15 minutes on any amendment that may be offered. The Senator from Wyoming will proceed.

THE EFFECT UPON LIVESTOCK

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I have described the condition in which the livestock industry found itself in 1933.

The Government came to its aid, helping the industry to meet the effects of overproduction. The Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act was passed. The report was spread abroad throughout the West that, as a result of such agreements, livestock and livestock products would be admitted into the United States in competition with the domestic producers who already had a surplus production.

I was one of the representatives of the Western States who went to the State Department and suggested that it would be altogether out of harmony with the entire emergency program if, as a result of any reciprocal-trade agreement, there should be admitted into the United States the livestock or livestock products of any other country. I may have been laboring under a misconception—and I have no doubt I was—but when I left the State Department I came away with the feeling that livestock would not be included in any reciprocal-trade agreement.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. Did not the Senator and also Representatives from other Western States who obtained the same impression assure their people that livestock would not be included in reciprocal-trade agreements?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator is absolutely correct. I suppose that every Senator from the Rocky Mountain area and from the Plains States gave that assurance to his constituents, and gave it in good faith.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. On this side we were unable to hear the statement made by the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator from New Mexico asked me if it was not a fact that I and several other Senators from the livestock-producing States gave assurance to our constituents that livestock and livestock products would not be admitted under any reciprocal-trade agreements.

Mr. BORAH. Did the Senator from Wyoming have authority to give such assurance?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I have stated, I will say to the Senator from Idaho, that I came away from the State Department with a distinct impression that no reciprocal-trade agreement would be entered into which affected livestock. I say that I was undoubtedly laboring under a misapprehension. I realize how difficult it is sometimes to understand a plain statement. However, when the agreement with Canada was made it contained a provision reducing the tariff upon livestock 1 cent a pound upon a limited quota. It is true that the quota was limited; it is true that the reduction of 1 cent a pound upon 156,000 head probably had no effect whatsoever upon the price of livestock in the United States; but it did have another effect. It had the effect of increasing the importations of livestock, though in so small an amount that no cattleman could feel he was injured.

SUBMITS REPORT

I hold in my hand a copy of a report entitled "A Summary" which was issued this week by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics of the United States Department of Agriculture on the beef-cattle situation. In this report, made public just this week, a report which came into my hands only yesterday, I find some very illuminating figures.

Table 4 gives the imports of cattle and beef for consumption during the period of 1926 to 1936. In 1930 there was imported into the United States 232,895 live cattle and calves. That year the Smoot-Hawley law went into effect. To what extent that law retarded these importations I shall not attempt to say, but the figures I hold in my hand show that during the very next year, 1931, the importations were only 95,355 head of cattle. In 1932 the importations increased to 105,612 head; in 1933 they dropped to 81,591 head; and in 1934 they further dropped to 66,304 head.

The depression may have been, and undoubtedly was, responsible for the decrease in the importations of cattle. It was in 1934 that the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act was passed. In 1935 the imports of live cattle increased to 378,124 head, an increase of 312,000 head as compared to the importations during the previous year. The reciprocal trade policy did not cause that increase. In 1936, however, following the adoption of the Canadian reciprocal tariff agreement, the importations of live cattle aggregated 410,299 head. That was an increase of only 32,175 head. It had, I am sure, not the slightest effect upon the price of cattle. Indeed, I said as much at the time. I told my constituents that they were benefited, not injured, by the Canadian pact.

The reciprocal trade agreement policy is affected by the most-favored-nation clause of our treaties; and as a result of the treaty with Canada—I withdraw the word "treaty" and say as the result of the Canadian agreement—the concessions granted to Canada were likewise granted to Mexico. It is true the quota limited them both, but cattle were coming in.

We had, or thought we had, a basis upon which to believe that cattle would not be affected by any trade agreement.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. I should like to interrupt the Senator to obtain a little information. The Senator said that the quota limitations upon the importation of cattle apply both to Mexico and Canada?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is correct.

Mr. ADAMS. What I should like to know is how is the quota distributed? If there are two countries or three countries or four countries from which cattle are being brought into the United States, how does the State Department distribute the quota?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I think the rule might be stated, "first come, first served." As the cattle come in, the Customs Bureau applies the tax, whatever it may be. There is a continuous, perhaps daily, weekly, or monthly report of the number of cattle coming into the United States, and, when the quota is reached, the tariff reduction ceases. If Canada should send in during the first month, let us say, 20,000 head of cattle, and Mexico should send in 5,000 head of cattle, then the agents of the Treasury Department would assess 25,000 against the quota, and so on, month by month.

Mr. ADAMS. Then, let me ask the Senator what assurance would the Dominion of Canada have that it would receive reciprocal benefits by being allowed under the trade agreement to bring in cattle if Mexico might consume the entire quota?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It would have the assurance that, under the normal conditions of trade between the two countries, Mexico shipping in a particular kind of cattle and Canada shipping in a different kind of cattle, Canada would have the largest proportion. That is the way it works out.

Mr. ADAMS. I thank the Senator for the information.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. To return to what I was saying, we have no more assurance today than we had 3 years ago that cattle will not be admitted from some other country; indeed, we have reason to believe that a reciprocal trade agreement may be made with Argentina by which livestock and livestock products will be admitted to the United States, again injuring the market of the American producer, who is already turning out a surplus.

In the same document to which I refererd a moment ago, issued only this week by the Department of Agriculture, I find a very interesting statement. It seems that in December last the Government of Great Britain entered into a trade agreement with the Republic of Argentina. Let me read what the Department of Agriculture says about that agreement:

> Import duties on all beef items imported by the United Kingdom were established by that country in a recent trade agreement with Argentina. Under the agreement a minimum beef import allotment was granted by the United Kingdom to Argentina. If Argentine shipments to Great Britain are reduced, an increased proportion of slaughtered cattle in Argentina probably will be diverted to the canned beef trade, with the result that larger supplies of canned beef may be available for shipment into the United States.

I find this additional very interesting report upon that agreement:

BRITAIN-ARGENTINA PACT SIGNED

A new trade agreement between Argentina and the United Kingdom was signed December 1, 1936. As a result of this agreement duties became effective December 16 on all beef items imported from foreign countries by the United Kingdom. The most important of these items are listed in the accompanying table.

In this table we find that Great Britain put into effect on December 16 an increase of the British tariff upon Argentine canned beef and veal tongue. The British duty was raised from 10 percent to 20 percent ad valorem. Are we not to take notice of what the Department of Agriculture tells us, that as a result of that doubling of the British tariff upon canned meat the supplies available for importation into the United States are going to be increased?

Frozen beef and frozen edible offal were on the free list in Great Britain until this new trade agreement with Argentina was entered into by the United Kingdom. They have been taken off the free list and have been placed upon the tariff list with a duty of 20 percent ad valorem.

Then we have salted beef, chilled beef, and frozen beef, all upon the free list under the old agreement, admitted into Great Britain without a tariff. Now we find them bearing a tariff ranging from 1.3 cents per pound to 1.5 cents per pound.

GREAT BRITAIN AIDS THE DOMINIONS

If we read the remainder of this document issued by the Department of Agriculture we find that Great Britain has increased its duties upon the importation of meat and meat products for the purpose of encouraging importation from the British dominions.

Great Britain, in entering into a reciprocal trade agreement with Argentina, has acted for the benefit of the British Dominions. It seems to me that those of us who represent livestock States can with propriety request that in the negotiation of any reciprocal trade agreement by this country, the State Department shall take cognizance of the needs of the American States which produce livestock and livestock products, particularly when our whole record shows that we have an oversupply of those products. If Great Britain can aid its Dominions, our State Department can aid the States of the American Union.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). The Senator's time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I shall take my time on the bill.

If an agreement should be entered into with Argentina by our State Department, Members of the Senate representing the livestock States may take their hats in their hands and wend their way down Pennsylvania Avenue to the Department of State, and there politely inquire whether or not cattle are to be included in an agreement with Argentina. The polite response they get will be, "We will do nothing that will injure your product."

That is a matter of opinion. That is a matter of interpretation. When I stand on the floor of this Chamber representing in part the State of Wyoming, in which there are so many livestock producers who are still struggling to get their feet upon the ground financially, I cannot be satisfied, as a representative of my people, with any assurance of that kind, particularly when I know that under the Constitution and the law I have the right myself to have a vote upon what the tariff shall be.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

Mr. MALONEY. Would not the Senator from Wyoming like to point out right there that to this problem of agriculture and the stock raiser might be added tomorrow or another day the problem of the industrial East, with the same worry and the same denial of consideration?

MUST NOT SURRENDER POWER

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator from Connecticut is absolutely correct. There is no difference between agriculture and industry so far as this is concerned. We are engaged here in formulating a law. We are engaged here in laying down a principle which is to guide the executive arm of the Government. That is our right. It is our duty to do that. If we represent our people we must do it, or else we confess that we are surrendering the power which was given to us under the Constitution, the power which we assumed when we took our offices.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. Will the Senator give a little additional information? I understand there is pending before the Foreign Relations Committee a treaty with Argentina in reference to the importation of cattle to this country. I am wondering what is the difference between that instrument and trade agreements, one of them going through the processes on senatorial consideration and approval, and those which are designated as agreements being exempt from our consideration and approval?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator's question, of course, directs attention immediately to that broad field of legal metaphysics in which the Supreme Court and other courts so frequently indulge when they make distinctions without a difference.

I said we are undertaking to enact a law which lays down a principle. What is to be done under this measure does not depend upon the character and ability of Secretary Hull or of Secretary Wallace. I yield to no man in the United States in my respect for the high character and ability and good intentions of Secretary Hull. I think he has done a major and a very beneficial work. I would not withdraw any credit whatsoever from him. I have an equally high regard for the Secretary of Agriculture. I think Secretary Wallace represents the very highest type of public servant, because he is a man of complete frankness, a man of intellectual integrity, a man who says exactly what he means, and one who is guided by no purpose other than a desire to benefit the people of America.

But this is not a bill to delegate to Secretary Hull and to Secretary Wallace the power to make trade agreements. This is a bill which has the effect of delegating this power to whomever may occupy positions in the State Department and in the Department of Agriculture that by administrative act have jurisdiction under this measure. In the vicissitudes of life both Secretary Hull and Secretary Wallace might pass out of the picture tomorrow. Who then would carry on the negotiations? Employees actuated by the high ideals and motives of these men?

Who is there in this body who is naive enough to imagine that negotiations are carried on by Secretary Hull himself and by Secretary Wallace himself? These negotiations are delegated to clerical employees who have no legislative responsibility to their constituencies back home who, indeed, have no responsibility to the people. We have no knowledge whatsoever as to what they may do at any time and under the terms of the bill as it is written there is no check upon them.

PEOPLE HAVE RIGHT TO KNOW

I am one who believes from the very bottom of my soul in the democratic process. The democratic process does not necessarily mean science and efficiency in the enactment of law. It means the enactment of law by the representatives of the people of the United States.

It means that those who are out in the country rely upon their representatives in the House and in the Senate to speak their minds upon the things that affect them. How can we speak the minds of our constituents if we delegate to subordinate employees in the Department of State and in the Department of Agriculture the power to do the things which it is our duty to do?

There is no answer to that question. It cannot be answered, except upon the ground that we are trying to do this thing in an efficient manner. I voted for the original act 3 years ago because we were in an emergency. It was necessary then to take extraordinary steps in order to bring the country out of the depression. We have made wonderful progress under the leadership of a very great and able and courageous President. We can begin to get back to fundamentals.

It seems to me the time has now come when we should take back to ourselves a portion of the power that is ours, the power that we surrendered in the interest of getting immediate action. This is particularly true since it appears that in 3 years we have made only 15 agreements, and know with any degree of accuracy the results of only two. The effects of the agreements with Cuba and Canada only have been studied. There is no official report on the other 13.

The amendment which I offer does not in any way hamper the State Department in the negotiation of these agreements. It merely provides that before the agreements shall become effective they shall have been filed in the Senate and in the House for 30 days so that the people of the country may know what is being done by their subordinate employees.

Can anybody object to that? Can anybody who believes in democratic principles in reason object to an amendment of this kind?

The amendment would have the effect of making it clear to those who negotiate these agreements in the future that before the agreements become effective they shall be known to the public. I believe in "open covenants, openly arrived at"; and I do hope the Members of the Senate will see fit to support the amendment which I present.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed as part of my remarks the official report from the Department of Agriculture from which I have quoted, issued in February of this year, being a summary of the beef-cattle situation; and I also ask unanimous consent that the report be printed as a Senate document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the report will be printed in the RECORD and as a Senate document.

(See S. Doc. 22.)

The report is as follows:

THE BEEF CATTLE SITUATION

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, BUREAU OF AGRICULTURAL ECONOMICS,
Washington, February 1937.

SUMMARY

Little change has occurred in the general beef cattle situation since issuance of the January report. Prices for all grades of cattle advanced from late December to mid-January. Although prices for most classes and grades of slaughter cattle declined during the last 2 weeks of the month and in early February, prices of choice and prime-grade steers were maintained at about the level reached in mid-January.

Though slaughter supplies of cattle and calves were smaller in January than in December, inspected slaughter of cattle, except for January 1936, was the largest for the month since 1919. Inspected calf slaughter was the largest for the month on record. The number and proportion of the better grades of slaughter steers were smaller than in December, but still considerably above average for the month.

Supplies of the better grades of grain-fed cattle probably will be curtailed considerably in the next 6 months because of the current short supplies of feed grains. For the year as a whole, inspected cattle and calf slaughter is expected to be smaller than the record high slaughter of 1936, but larger than average for the 10 years 1924–33.

Cattle prices in 1937 are expected to average perhaps 10 to 20 percent higher than in 1936 as a result of the reduced slaughter supplies and probable improvement in consumer demand. It is anticipated that the advance in prices of the better grades of slaughter cattle which began in late 1936 will continue, or at least be well maintained in the first half of 1937. Prices of the lower grades of cattle probably will advance seasonally in the next 3 or 4 months.

Although cattle prices are expected to be higher in 1937 than in 1936, imports of Canadian cattle probably will be no larger, and may be smaller, than those of last year because of a reduction in the number of Canadian-fed cattle available for shipment.

Import duties on all beef items imported by the United Kingdom were established by that country in a recent trade agreement with Argentina. Under the agreement minimum beef import allotments were granted by the United Kingdom to Argentina. If Argentine shipments to Great Britain are reduced, an increased proportion of the slaughter cattle in Argentina probably will be diverted to the canned-beef trade, with the result that larger supplies of canned beef may be available for shipment to the United States.

REVIEW OF RECENT DEVELOPMENTS

Prices; decline in late January: Prices of all grades of slaughter cattle advanced fairly sharply from late December to mid-January. A recession occurred in prices of nearly all grades during the second half of the month and in early February. Prices for the better grades of steers at Chicago, however, averaged higher in the first week of February than in late December and early January.

Prices of vealers and heavy calves also advanced during the first half of January, but declined during the latter half to levels lower than those of a month earlier. Stocker and feeder cattle prices followed the same general course as prices of comparable grades of slaughter cattle and maintained a relatively strong position with respect to prices of such cattle during the month.

The top price of slaughter cattle at Chicago reached $14.50 per 100 pounds in late January, the highest price paid at that market since early last year. Although most grades of cattle declined in price during the last 2 weeks of January and the first week of February, prices of choice and prime-grade steers were maintained at about the level reached in mid-January—a reflection of the decrease in market receipts and the anticipated scarcity in supplies of heavy well-finished cattle in the next few months.

Prices of choice and prime-grade steers at Chicago advanced sharply in early January and averaged $13.12 per 100 pounds for the month, compared with $11.82 in December and $13.03 in January a year earlier. (See table 1, supplemental data.) Prices for other grades of beef steers also advanced from December to January, but the advances in prices for the lower grades were less pronounced than those for choice and prime-grade steers. The average price of all grades of beef steers at Chicago was $10.69 per 100 pounds in January, compared with $10.27 in December and $9.30 a year earlier.

Inspected slaughter, January records: Inspected slaughter of cattle in January totaled 867,000 head, 12 percent smaller than in December and 4 percent smaller than in January a year earlier. Except for January 1936, however, it was the largest for the month since 1919. Inspected calf slaughter totaled 484,000 head, 2 percent smaller than in December but 4 percent larger than a year earlier, and the largest for the month on record. (See table 2, supplementary data.)

Receipts of beef steers at Chicago in January were somewhat smaller than in December, but larger than in January a year earlier. Marketings of choice and prime grade steers declined from December to January, while marketings of all other grades increased. The proportion of choice and prime grade steers in the Chicago receipts declined from 39 percent of the total in December to 27 percent in January. Most of this decline was of a seasonal nature, however, and both the number and proportion of choice and prime grade steers marketed in January were considerably larger than those of a year earlier and larger than average for the month.

Storage supplies, above average: Stocks of beef in cold storage in public warehouses and packing plants on February 1 amounted to 181,000,000 pounds, 7 percent less than on January 1, but still considerably above average. Although storage holdings of beef declined during January, holdings of pork increased, and total meats reported in cold storage on February 1, including pork, beef, lamb, and mutton, amounted to 930,000,000 pounds, compared with 871,000,000 pounds a month earlier and 543,000,000 pounds a year earlier. These combined holdings were the largest for February 1 since 1929.

Storage holdings in January and early February this year included a relatively large proportion of frozen pork and beef, indicating that as slaughter supplies, particularly of hogs, are reduced in February and March, a good part of the meat in storage will move into consumptive channels. The increase in holdings of meats and lard over a year earlier was equivalent in live weight to about 2,500,000 head of hogs, 150,000 head of cattle, and 175,000 head of sheep and lambs.

IMPORTS IN 1936 WITH 1937 OUTLOOK

Imports of cattle and calves, and of fresh, pickled and cured, and canned beef in 1936, if converted to a live weight basis, amounted to 572,000,000 pounds compared with 496,000,000 pounds in 1935. Imports in 1936 were exceeded only by those in the years 1927–29, when they were the largest on record. The live weight equivalent of imports in 1936 was equal to about 5 percent of the live weight of cattle and calves slaughtered under Federal inspection and to only about 3 percent of the estimated total slaughter in the United States.

Canned beef was the most important beef import item in 1936, making up 57 percent of the total on an equivalent weight basis. Live animals constituted 41 percent of the total, while fresh, pickled, and cured beef amounted to only 2 percent.

Canned beef—upward trend since 1931: Canned beef imported by the United States originates mostly in Argentina and Uruguay. Such imports have increased fairly steadily since 1931 as a result of restrictions imposed on chilled and frozen beef imports by the United Kingdom and other European countries and, since 1933, as a result of rising prices for beef and veal in the United States. Total canned beef imports amounted to approximately 88,000,000 pounds actual weight in 1936, compared with 76,000,000 pounds in 1935 and 80,000,000 pounds in 1929, the previous high.

New United Kingdom-Argentina trade agreement.—A new trade agreement between Argentina and the United Kingdom was signed December 1, 1936. As a result of this agreement, duties became effective December 16 on all beef items imported from foreign countries by the United Kingdom. The most important of these items are listed in the accompanying table.

Import duties on beef in the United Kingdom

Item	Duty effective Dec. 16, 1936	Duty previously in effect
Canned beef and veal tongues	20 percent ad valorem	10 percent ad valorem.
Frozen edible offals	do	Free.
Salted beef	1.3 cents per pound	Do.
Chilled beef	1.5 cents per pound	Do.
Frozen beef	1.3 cents per pound	Do.

These duties apply to imports from United States and other foreign countries as well as from Argentina, but do not apply to imports from British dominions. The duties are calculated to represent a rate of about 20 percent ad valorem. The agreement provides that if the ad-valorem equivalent of the specific rates should fall as low as 17.5 percent as a result of rising prices, the duties on an ad-valorem basis for other types of beef would be reduced correspondingly for a period of 6 months.

No definite system of actual import quotas has been established for beef. The agreement mentions a British proposal, however, for a conference of all interested countries for the purpose of reaching an agreement concerning the division of beef imports by the United Kingdom between domestic, Empire, and foreign producers. In the event of such an agreement, it is provided that Argentina shall receive a share in any non-Empire beef allotment that the United Kingdom may establish which will be no less in quantity or in proportion to the total non-Empire allotment than the minimum allotment to Argentina set forth in the trade agreement.

Under this recent agreement, Argentina is guaranteed certain minimum import allotments by the United Kingdom. The 1937 minimum allotment for chilled beef represents a reduction of about 2 percent from the 1935 level of imports from Argentina. The allotment for imports of frozen beef is about the same in quantity as actual imports from Argentina in 1935. Chilled beef is the principal item in the Argentine beef trade with Great Britain, and the allotment agreement plus the imposition of duties may result in a moderate decline in total shipments of beef to Great Britain. If such shipments are curtailed, the quantity of canned beef from South America available for shipment to the United States is likely to be increased.

Cattle and calves—sharp increase 1934 to 1936: Most of the live cattle and calves imported by the United States originate in Canada and Mexico. Imports of cattle from Canada increased sharply from 1934 to 1936, largely as a result of rising prices for cattle in the United States but partly because of the lowering of the import duty in 1936 from 3 to 2 cents a pound for cattle weighing over 700 pounds on a quota for all countries limited to 156,000 head. This quota was exceeded by about 9,000 head in 1936, Canada supplying 143,000 head and Mexico 22,000 head (exclusive of cattle imported for breeding purposes).

Imports of cattle in excess of the quota are subject to the full duty of 3 cents per pound. Reduced duties also apply to a quota of 20,000 head for dairy cows, weighing 700 pounds and over, imported from all sources. Only 6,700 head of such cattle were imported in 1936. The duty for the first 20,000 head of cows imported for dairy purposes in each calendar year is 1½ cents a pound compared with 3 cents for all such cows imported in excess of the quota. The same reduced rate applies to the first 52,000 head of calves weighing less than 175 pounds imported in the calendar year. Imports of calves in excess of that number are subject to the full duty for cattle weighing less than 700 pounds of 2½ cents a pound. The quota for calves was exceeded slightly in 1936, Canada supplying nearly all of such imports. Total imports of cattle and calves from Canada in 1936 amounted to 244,000 head compared with 126,000 head in 1935, and with 7,000 head in 1934 when cattle prices in the United States were relatively low.

Cattle and calves from Mexico normally are imported for further grazing in the range States and usually consist largely of animals weighing less than 700 pounds. In 1936, however, imports of cattle from Mexico weighing over 700 pounds were larger than in the preceding year largely as a result of the reduction in the duty on such cattle. Total imports of cattle from Mexico were smaller in 1936 than in 1935, totaling 165,000 head compared with 251,000 head in 1935 and 57,000 head in 1934.

Although the reduction in the duty under the reciprocal trade agreement with Canada accounted for a part of the increase in cattle imports in 1936, it is likely that imports of cattle from Canada would have increased considerably even if there had been no change in duty. Following the favorable returns from feeding in the winter and spring of 1934–35, cattle feeding in Canada as well as in the United States was expanded considerably in 1935–36. The relatively large shipments which characterized the first 9 months of 1936 were partly the result of this increased feeding.

The number of cattle imported from Canada in 1937 will depend in part on the level of cattle prices in this country and partly on the supply of Canadian cattle available for shipment. Cattle prices in the United States are expected to be higher in 1937 than in 1936, but it is probable that the number of fed cattle in Canada available for market in the first half of 1937 will be smaller than a year earlier because of reduced feed supplies and the unfavorable returns from cattle feeding last winter.

Imports of cattle from Canada in January were larger than those of a year earlier largely as a result of the relatively high prices in United States markets, and the small imports in December after the quota was filled. Such supplies of Canadian cattle, however, are expected to be rather sharply curtailed in the next 3 or 4 months. The total of such imports in the first half of 1937 probably will be no larger than a year earlier and may be smaller.

OUTLOOK

Demand for beef to continue high: Payments by packers for cattle and calves slaughtered under Federal inspection in 1936 amounted to $715,000,000, a 10-percent increase over 1935, and the largest total for any year since 1930. Such payments are expected to show a further increase in 1937 as a result of continued improvement in consumer purchasing power.

Consumer demand for beef and veal will be supported by increased national income in 1937. National income made an estimated 12-percent gain in 1936, and a further increase is anticipated for 1937. An additional supporting factor will be the relatively small supplies of hogs available for slaughter. Hog production in 1935 and 1936 was more severely affected by drought than cattle production, and slaughter supplies of hogs are expected to continue relatively small in 1937.

Beef and veal large in proportion to total meat production: As a result of the decline in slaughter supplies of hogs from 1929–33 levels and the increase in supplies of cattle and calves, the dressed weight of cattle and calves constituted 47 percent of the total dressed weight of livestock slaughtered under Federal inspection in 1936, 50 percent in 1935, and 42 percent in 1934. The dressed weight of cattle and calves in the 5 years from 1929 to 1933 averaged 35 percent of the total dressed weight of inspected livestock slaughtered. During this period the dressed weight of hogs slaughtered averaged 60 percent of the total. Cattle and calf slaughter in 1937 probably will continue to constitute a relatively large proportion of total livestock slaughter as in 1935 and 1936.

Slaughter to be smaller than 1936, but larger than average: Inspected slaughter of cattle and calves in 1937 is expected to be smaller than the record high slaughter of 1936, but considerably larger than average for the 10 years 1924–33. The number and proportion of the better grades of grain-fed cattle, however, probably will be somewhat smaller than average because of the current short supplies of feed grains.

Cattle prices during the spring and summer probably will show sufficient strength in relation to feed prices to encourage retention of breeding stock, assuming that feed grain and hay production in 1937 will be about normal. This will result in a reduction in the number of cows and heifers available for slaughter from late spring 1937 until the calves are born in the spring of 1938.

Most of the reduction in slaughter supplies of steers is expected to occur in the western Corn Belt States, where the number of cattle on feed January 1 showed a decrease of 33 percent from the number on feed a year earlier. The number on feed in the eastern Corn Belt States showed a decline of only about 3½ percent. In the 11 Western States and Texas and Oklahoma the number of cattle on feed January 1 was about 10 percent larger than those on feed a year earlier and twice as large as the number on January 1, 1935.

The number of steers sold out of first hands from the Corn Belt for slaughter at Chicago in 1937 probably will not be greatly different from that of 1935, although smaller than that of 1936. The number of cattle on feed at the beginning of the year was somewhat larger than 2 years earlier, but a larger proportion of the grain available in the Corn Belt is expected to be used for hog feeding this year. Many of the feeder cattle shipped into the Corn Belt last fall will be carried through the winter on hay, fodder, and other roughage, pastured next summer, and fed out on grain in the winter of 1937–38.

Prices likely to average higher in 1937: The general level of cattle prices in 1937, on the basis of present indications, is expected to average from 10 to 20 percent higher than in 1936 as a result of reduced slaughter supplies and the probable further improvement in consumer demand. It is anticipated that the number of well-finished cattle marketed in the first 6 months of 1937 will be smaller than a year earlier, and the advance in the price of the better grades which began in late 1936 will continue or at least be well maintained in the first half of 1937. The movement in prices of these kinds of cattle is usually downward from January through April.

Prices of the lower grades of cattle usually advance during the early months of the year. Although the proportion of the lower grades in the total slaughter supply is expected to be relatively large, prices for these kinds of cattle probably will advance seasonally during the first half of the year. It is anticipated that the relatively small number of slaughter hogs that will be available in this period will lend strength to prices of the lower grades of cattle.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, there is little difference between this amendment and the amendment which the Senate has already voted down, offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER]. Of course, the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas called for the vote of two-thirds of the Senators present in order to ratify one of these agreements. In that respect the proposal is somewhat changed; but if the pending amendment should be agreed to it would mean a death blow to this program just as effectively as if the Capper amendment had been agreed to.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. HATCH. I am very much interested in this amendment. Is it the opinion of the Senator from Mississippi that if the pending amendment should be adopted, a vote of the Senate would be required before one of these agreements could become effective?

Mr. HARRISON. It would be necessary to send the agreement back to the Congress, and it would have to lie over for a certain time, which would result in slowing up all negotiations. I do not know whether the amendment calls for a vote by Congress or not. Does it?

Mr. HATCH. My understanding is that the amendment does not call for a vote. If I am in error about that, I should be glad to be corrected.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I will say that the amendment does not call for a vote. It is a poor, weak thing at best, and merely requires that the proposed agreements shall be filed with the Senate and with the House, with nothing further.

Mr. HARRISON. I cannot see what particular good it would do, except that it would give the gentlemen who have been opposed to these trade agreements all the time another opportunity to come up and make their protests, talk to Representatives and Senators, and probably frighten some of them.

What I rose to do, however, so that no one from the West or anywhere else may be misled, is to show the condition of the cattle industry today, as reported by the facts as I have gathered them, and what it was a few years ago.

The Senator from Wyoming called attention to the fact that in 1935 there was a large increase in the importations of cattle to the United States; that in 1934 only 57,679 cattle were imported, and that in 1935, 364,000 cattle were imported. That is true; but at that time the agreement with Canada was not in force. Those cattle came in at a time when the tariff on cattle was 3 cents a pound. I will ask the Senator from Wyoming whether that is not correct.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It is.

Mr. HARRISON. In 1936 the importations rose to 338,386 cattle. The Canadian agreement went into effect only a few months ago. Certainly these increased importations from 1934 were not influenced by any favored treatment in the way of concessions to the Canadian Government.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I acknowledge that the Canadian agreement probably had no bad effect upon the cattle market. As a matter of fact, I have defended the Canadian agreement, because I recognized the fact that we purchased in Canada a larger market for some of our industrial products; and by purchasing that increased market we put some of our mechanics to work, put some of those in industry to work, and, perhaps, we increased the market for our home products. That may be true. I will say to the Senator from Mississippi, however, that that is not the point.

The point is this: If we make one agreement with Canada which does very little damage, we may make another one with Argentina that will do a great deal of damage, because the importation of canned meats into the United States from Argentina and Uruguay has been increasing by leaps and bounds.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator how much canned beef is produced in the United States?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The canned beef produced in the United States is made only from the cheaper grades of livestock. That is true; but in Argentina and in Uruguay the canned beef comes from the very best grade of livestock. Therefore the canned beef that comes from South America is in direct competition with the very best products of our farms and ranches.

Mr. HARRISON. If the people interested in the American cattle industry would go into the production of canned beef, they might have a peg to stand upon to try to protect themselves against the importation of canned beef. We do not produce any canned beef in this country. What we have done in this matter—and I am delighted to hear the Senator from Wyoming say so—is that probably we have not affected the price of cattle or the cattle industry, because the statistics clearly show that we have not done so.

Let us consider the prices. In 1934 we imported from Canada only 1,825 head of cattle. What was the price of cattle in the United States at that time? The price was less than 5 cents a pound—to be exact, 4.91 cents a pound. In 1936, under this agreement, some more cattle came in, to the number of 156,000. That is their quota, and they cannot go over it; but those 156,000 cattle bore a tariff duty of 2 cents a pound, as high a duty as was incorporated in the Republican Fordney-McCumber high protective tariff act; and that is all the protection the cattle raisers asked for even then. Those 156,000 cattle coming to the United States from Canada under this agreement did not come in free of any tariff duty. They came in under the rates of the old Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act.

Under the agreement with Canada we have reduced the rate on cattle 1 cent from the rate of the general law. We have reduced it from 3 cents to 2 cents. That was a concession we had to make in order to get some concessions in the market in Canada. As I pointed out the other day, I have no doubt that the cattle people receive far more benefit than harm by virtue of this small concession, because as the country's economic condition is helped, business revives, employment is increased, industries start up, and the purchasing power of the people increases, the cattle people can sell more of their beef and they can sell it at a higher price. So this is but one of the great factors in the wonderful program of this administration that has helped the cattle industry of this country.

I am glad the Senator from Wyoming has told us his position on this subject. What was the price of cattle when a good many cattle were coming in from other countries? It was less than 5 cents a pound, as I have pointed out. What is it today? A fraction under 8 cents a pound—more than one and one-half times as much as it was in those days.

As to bringing the agreements back to Congress, that would be a cause of delay. That would just hinder the consummation of the agreements, and prevent this program being put into operation. I desire to recall to the Senate the fact that when the Dingley law of 1897 and the McKinley law of 1890 were enacted, the Senate was controlled by the Republican Party. McKinley was a great Republican. Dingley was a great Republican. A provision was then written into the law giving to the President the right to negotiate trade agreements. There were two provisions. One of them was a limited delegation of power, providing that he had to deal with foreign countries with reference to particular products and particular articles, and name them.

The other was that when agreements had been negotiated, they must come back to the Senate for ratification.

The Senate did not ratify a single agreement made under the general provison that the agreements had to be brought back to the Senate for ratification, although there were negotiated and made effective 12 trade agreements that worked to the advantage of this country. If it had been necessary to come back here for ratification of these agreements, we should be talking now about the rate on cattle, and many Members would be led off in regard to it.

The only way in which we can carry forward this fine program is to vote down such amendments as this, let these trade agreements be written fairly and justly, taking into consideration every factor entering into the matter, and then let the agreements be consummated without bringing them back here to let blocs be formed, and harangues made, and delay indulged in ad infinitum.

I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi has made a very eloquent and vehement speech which has absolutely nothing to do with the pending amendment. There is not the remotest purpose or possibility, under the pending amendment, that any agreement would have to come back to the Senate for ratification. The only thing in the world involved in the amendments is a very meek and timid proposal that the American people shall be put on notice for 30 days as to what is to happen to them before it happens. That is all in the world there is in the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator how he voted, when a similar amendment was offered, when the matter was before the Senate on a previous occasion? When the Senate considered the trade-agreement proposal on a previous occasion, how did the Senator vote on the amendment?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I hope I voted for it; I assume I did.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the Senator voted against it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think I voted for it. I do not know what difference it makes, anyway, because this particular proposal amounts almost to nothing in respect to the authority granted. I was proposing to offer an amendment which would go a little further, to give the American producer just a casual chance for his "white alley." But if this much cannot be done, there certainly is no sense in attempting to do something more. It is not a matter of ratification; that has not anything to do with it. It is not a matter of canned beef; it is a matter of "canned treaties", and that is all.

I repeat, it is solely a question whether the American people shall be put on notice respecting what is intended to be done to them before it happens, so that if, let us say, inadvertently and unwittingly the State Department negotiators do something which manifestly develops to be unprofitable, there still will be an opportunity for them upon their own responsibility to correct their error.

Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi pleads that a 30-day delay would be utterly ruinous to all these wishful dreams. When these agreements have been signed over here and go to the other contracting nation, there is not only a 30-day delay but usually there is a 90-day delay, and often there is a 6- or an 8- or a 10-month delay. The other parties do not worry about 30 days in which their nationals might be permitted just a casual, brief squint at what their government proposes to do in respect of their economic life. Thirteen out of fifteen agreements had to be submitted to the legislative branch of the other government. In one instance it took 11 months to complete the agreement on the other side of the water; in another instance it took 6 months, in another 8 months, in another 5 months. The average, I should say, is about 3 months.

The only thing in the world the Senator from Wyoming is proposing is that after the negotiators have concluded and the President has prepared to proclaim the net result, 30 days shall elapse in which those who may be malignantly affected can have an opportunity to protest. They would not have any power; they would have merely a chance to present their petition and point out what is about to happen.

I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that, in my humble judgment, if this sort of a provision had existed in connection with the law, if a 30-day breathing spell had been provided in respect to the Colombian and the Brazilian treaties, and the texts had been made public, I strongly suspect that the Department of Justice would have sent word over to the Department of State that when they were trying to abrogate treaties through trade agreements, and when they were reaching into the internal taxing power of the United States with their trade agreements, they had better back up, because manifestly they were on unconstitutional ground.

Mr. President, I cannot think of a reason on earth why the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming should not be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY].

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRNES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from California [Mr. McADOO] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. McNARY. The senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] would vote "yea" if present and voting.

Mr. BYRD. My colleague the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] has a general pair with the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD].

Mr. MINTON. I announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. DONAHEY] is detained from the Senate because of illness.

The senior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] and the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] are absent attending the funeral of the late Representative Buchanan.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HOLT], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from California [Mr. McADOO], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] are unavoidably detained.

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 48, as follows:

So Mr. O'MAHONEY's amendment was rejected.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, on behalf of my colleague [Mr. ANDREWS] and myself and the Senators from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON and Mr. ELLENDER], I send forward an amendment, which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 1, line 8, before the period, it is proposed to insert a colon and the following:

Provided, however, That in the negotiation of any new agreement or agreements, or in the renewal or extension of any existing agreement or agreements, under the authority of this act the tariffs or import duties upon all agricultural and horticultural products shall be maintained at a point which will at least equalize the difference in the cost of production thereof in the country or countries dealt with and the United States as determined by the United States Tariff Commission as of the date any such new or extended agreement becomes effective.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, Senators will observe that the chief difference between this amendment which has been offered by my colleague [Mr. ANDREWS] and myself and joined in by the two Senators from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON and Mr. ELLENDER] and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] is that the amendment of the Senator from Michigan applied the cost-of-production rule to all imports, of whatever character. The pending amendment limits the application of that rule to the importation of agricultural and horticultural products. I did not presume to venture a sentiment contrary to the sentiments of my party when it related to industries not vitally a part of the activity of my own State, but I have peculiar knowledge of the adverse effect which agricultural and horticultural products grown by the citizenry of south Florida have sustained with respect to Cuban agricultural and horticultural competition.

I therefore respectfully offer the amendment designed for the protection of basic industries of my State and this Nation, and I respectfully ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I think the same arguments which were advanced with respect to a previous amendment are applicable to this amendment. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRNES (when his name was called). I announce that I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from California [Mr. McADOO] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. McNARY (when Mr. HALE's name was called). Mr. President, I announce that the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], if present, would vote "yea" on this amendment.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. I announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. DONAHEY] is detained from the Senate on account of illness.

The senior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] and the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] are absent attending the funeral of the late Representative Buchanan.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY], the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] are unavoidably detained.

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] are detained in a committee meeting.

Mr. BYRD. My colleague the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who is absent because of illness, has a general pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD]

Mr. McNARY. My colleague [Mr. STEIWER] is detained on official business. He is paired on this vote with the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]. If present, the Senator from Oregon would vote "yea", and I am advised that the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], if present, would vote "nay."

Mr. HARRISON (after having voted in the negative). I change my vote from "nay" to "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 43, nays 36, as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Megill, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the Vice President:

S. 417. An act to extend the period during which direct obligations of the United States may be used as collateral security for Federal Reserve notes;

H. R. 824. An act for the relief of James Luker, Sr.; and

H. R. 4609. An act to authorize the purchase and distribution of products of the fishing industry.

EXTENSION OF AUTHORITY TO NEGOTIATE TRADE AGREEMENTS

The Senate resumed consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 96) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I send forward another amendment proposed by my colleague [Mr. ANDREWS] and myself, and joined in by the Senators from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON and Mr. ELLENDER], which I ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 8, before the period, it is proposed to insert a colon and the following:

Provided, however, That no agreement or proclamation shall be made which directly or indirectly shall have the effect of restricting or shall result in or require restrictions upon the production or marketing in the United States of any agricultural commodity which is produced in the United States in quantities insufficient for the consumption requirements thereof.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, the amendment merely provides that in any case when an agricultural commodity is not produced in this country in sufficient quantities to meet the needs of the home market such commodity shall not be the subject of negotiation under the authority of the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act.

In connection with my remarks I ask that there be printed in the RECORD a memorandum in support of the proposed amendment, a telegram from Gainesville, Fla., addressed to me, in support of the amendment, and a letter from Mr. Clarence R. Bitting dealing with the subject.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM IN SUPPORT OF THE AMENDMENT INTENDED TO BE PROPOSED BY MR. PEPPER TO THE HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 96, EXTENDING THE AUTHORITY OF THE PRESIDENT UNDER SECTION 350 OF THE TARIFF ACT OF 1930, AS AMENDED

The American market is by far the world's best market; and it is a known market. No one can possibly seriously deny this. That market belongs first to the American producer and the American laborer. It is doubtful that any one would seriously deny this. Florida is in favor of any trade arrangement or plan which helps to bring about a greater exchange of goods, whether the production of American farmers or of American laborers, between the United States and foreign countries, but it is unalterably opposed to any arrangement which exchanges the American market which the American producer and laborer can supply for an unknown and less important foreign market. Florida is entirely sympathetic with the necessity of exchanging surplus cotton, wheat, tobacco, and other surplus crops and surpluses of manufactured goods for things which we need and do not produce or produce in insufficient quantities. It is unalterably opposed to the opening up of our American market to competing low-wage countries so that they may sell us products which are already a surplus in this country. It is equally opposed to the opening up of the American market to low-wage countries so that they may sell a commodity which is a nonsurplus commodity which we can produce in this country, when the opening up of that market means reducing the production in the United States of that nonsurplus commodity.

The first is a matter of carrying out the trade-agreement powers in the interests of the United States. It would seem hardly necessary to have to tell those who are to carry out the trade agreements that they must not give low-wage countries the right to compete on the American market with respect to cotton, tobacco, wheat, or any other surplus crop. No arrangement giving up any part of the American market in respect to this question can possibly be in the interest of the United States. Yet our representatives did this very thing when they gave to Cuba the American market with respect to fruits and vegetables produced in ample quantities in the United States, and forced American producers to sell on the American market at a price below cost. No general rule would have to be prescribed or probably could be prescribed in this particular. It goes to the question of competency in effectuating trade agreements. If this part of the American market is to be taken away from the American producer and American laborer, then, obviously, we should terminate the power to make trade agreements, or insist that those who represent the United States be competent to trade our surplus commodities for things we need.

The second question is one which requires interpretation and requires a clean-cut understandable limitation upon the powers granted under the law. Clearly we want to exchange our market for products in which we are deficient for a foreign market for the products of which we have a surplus. But just as the Congress has limited the tariff reduction to 50 percent, so, too, should the Congress tell the executive branch what the limitation should be with respect to the market which may be traded. The limitation should be such that no part of the market which the American producer or American laborer can supply shall be traded away. If we are deficient in the production of any commodity and the American market therefor is to be traded away, it should not be traded away to the extent that we be required in this country to limit the production of that commodity.

For example, we are deficient in the production of flax, wool, and sugar. In the case of wool, we supply the entire American market with the sort of wool which we can produce. We import the cheaper variety, known as carpet wool, and a very high-grade wool which we use for blending. So long as we import those wools only, we are trading so much of the American market which we cannot supply. It should be made clear that the Congress does not want traded away any part of that market which we can supply. In the case of flax and sugar, the question of quality does not arise. We are confronted then with limiting the power to the trade away of so much of the American market as the American producer cannot supply.

There would seem to be every reason why the American market for sugar should not be traded away except to the extent that the American producer cannot supply that market. Less than 25 percent of our sugar requirements is produced in continental United States, and less than 40 percent if Hawaii be included, and we are capable of producing more, at a fair price to the consumer, if permitted to sell it.

The Everglades of Florida have been endowed by nature with all of the worth-while, and none of the sordid, elements that combine to make it the outstanding sugar-producing area of the United States. It is one of the greatest undeveloped natural resources of the country.

Based on Tariff Commission reports on sugar for other areas and United States Sugar Corporation annual reports for Florida, cane sugar can be produced at lower unit cost in Florida than in Hawaii or Puerto Rico, at approximately the same cost as the Philippines, and at but little higher than the Cuban average cost, and this despite the payment of American wages in Florida only.

Spokesmen for "offshore" areas, testifying under oath during Tariff Commission hearings, stated that during the period 1929–32 they did not pay their labor sufficient to house and feed themselves. In the Florida Everglades field workers on cane plantations receive free housing, free medical care, free recreational facilities, free schooling for children, merchandise, food, and other supplies from company-operated stores at cost, no compulsory buying, no running accounts, no profit to company, and in addition receive in cash very much higher than average farm wages in the United States.

Hawaiian production costs are stated to be 2.854 cents per pound; Puerto Rican costs 2.818 cents and Philippine costs 2.360 (during hearings representatives of these areas stated such costs were too low to be used as averages); Florida costs in 1934 were 2.582 cents; 1935, 2.6459 cents; and 1936, 2.55 cents, including taxes, depreciation, and transportation to continental refinery. While Cuban costs have in many instances, though not all, been under Florida costs, this is not surprising when it is considered that spokesmen appearing under oath have admitted that, in some instances, wages were from 15 cents to 20 cents a day, and that in some instances labor has been worked for their keep alone. If wages and working conditions are taken into account, then Florida is the low-cost area for the production of sugar and can still produce sugar at a fair cost for the consumer.

Florida can produce thousands of tons more of sugar to supply the American market, pay decent wages, and at the same time sell cheap sugar to the American consumer.

In addition, the per-capita use of automobiles, radios, mechanical refrigerators, and telephones in Florida is many times greater than in any of the offshore sugar areas. This is accounted for by the fact that the wage scale and standard of living is very much higher in Florida. If Florida is permitted to sell the sugar which it is capable of producing on the American market it will mean not only the employment of thousands more persons directly in the production of sugar, but also the employment of many thousands of others in the factories of America.

It is, therefore, extremely logical to place the limitation upon the power given to the Executive in the manner proposed by this amendment.

Since the American market belongs primarily to the American people, they should not be deprived of that right through the trading away of so much of the American market as would require a restriction on the production of any nonsurplus crop. Neither the American farmer nor the American laborer should be penalized even by partial exclusion from the market that essentially and by all historical precedent belongs to him.

No foreign country has any vested right to our continental market. Every foreign country is seeking and expending its every effort to become self-sufficient, all in furtherance of their national defense and economic policies. They buy from us only those things which they cannot themselves produce or obtain at lower prices from others. They are willing to trade and have been trading the right to their market only with respect to those articles which they do not produce or produce in sufficient quantities.

A similar policy is the only one fair to the American producer and American laborer. The amendment which I propose merely places a limitation upon that part of the market which may be traded in conformity with the principles which guide foreign nations on their side in negotiating those trade agreements. This amendment recognizes that the American market belongs first to the American producer and the American laborer, and Florida, therefore, urges that this amendment be incorporated in the law, so that the American market will be reserved for them and will not be traded away.

GAINESVILLE, FLA., February 22, 1937.

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Am authorized to submit following resolution for your consideration: "Be it

"Resolved by those representatives of agriculture, industry, science, and finance in attendance at the Florida Chemurgic Conference at Gainesville February 20, That the chairman be authorized to petition appropriate officials of the Federal Government having jurisdiction in the extension and negotiation of reciprocal-trade treaties and in the establishment of domestic and imported sugar allotments that the people of the State of Florida be permitted at least to produce enough sugar within their own State to feed themselves and those guests whom they are pleased to welcome from the other 47 States of the Union. Florida's present sugar allotment is only 60,000 tons annually, or about one-half its requirements. It has ample acreage of fertile soil, willing farmers, and sorely pressed unemployed available to produce this increased allotment. It is with a feeling of embarrassment and in a spirit of utmost humility that the people of this State find it necessary to petition the Federal Government for the divine right to till their own soil to feed themselves; be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the distinguished Florida citizens who represent this State in the Senate and in the House of the United States Congress with the plea that they intercede in behalf of their constituents and of their just rights."

B. F. WILLIAMSON, Chairman.

NEW YORK, February 15, 1937.

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR PEPPER: Much has been said and written about the economic sin of producing sugar in continental United States because the costs of such production are claimed to be so much higher than the costs in "offshore" areas.

The Fifth Annual Report of United States Sugar Corporation, page 25, presents statistics that conclusively disprove the contention that it costs more to produce sugar on the continent than in the "offshore" areas.

Using the 1935–1936 unit costs for Florida with the 1929–1930 unit costs taken from Tariff Commission's report for "offshore" areas show that Florida should be the sugar bowl of the continent as the costs of production of raw cane sugar plus cost of delivery to continental refinery, in cents per pound, 96° equivalent, compare as follows: Florida, 2.55; Hawaii, 3.00; Puerto Rico, 2.86; Philippine Islands, 2.47; Cuba, 1.86.

The production of our own necessities, particularly when they can be produced at a comparable cost and in addition pay an American scale of wages, is economically sound and will greatly increase the national wealth and welfare as well as aid in the national defense.

The American market for the American producer.

Very truly yours,

CLARENCE R. BITTING.

Mr. PEPPER. I move the adoption of the amendment, and ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I hope this amendment will not be adopted. There is no doubt about the wisdom of the policy of the administration with reference to reciprocal-trade agreements. The last amendment which was adopted, in my opinion, practically kills the program, and I hope at some time we may secure a reconsideration of that action; but if this amendment and other amendments are tacked on, we had just as well throw up our hands and withdraw this proposal. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], on which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRNES (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], which I transfer to the junior Senator from California [Mr. McADOO], and will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. McNARY. The senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], if present, would vote "yea" on the pending amendment.

Mr. LEWIS. I announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. DONAHEY] is detained from the Senate on account of illness.

The senior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] and the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] are absent attending the funeral of the late Representative Buchanan.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY], the Senator from California [Mr. McADOO], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] are unavoidably detained.

Mr. BYRD. My colleague the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] is detained from the Senate by illness. He has a general pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD].

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 52, as follows:

So Mr. PEPPER's amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution is still before the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, in this particular matter I feel somewhat like an abandoned orphan and, for that reason, I deem it wise to make a statement as to the faith which leads me to vote as I am going to vote.

During the year 1929, when the flexible tariff provision was before the Congress, I was not a Member of the body. I was at that time a more constant and more faithful reader of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD than I am now. I sat at the feet, as it were, of the great leaders in this body. I read their discussions of the flexible tariff; I accepted their views. I read the arguments of the Republican brethren on the other side. I felt that the arguments which they advanced were entirely inadequate to meet the case made on this side of the aisle.

Three years ago I voted when this matter came up in accordance with the conviction which had come to me, sitting at the feet of the great Democratic leaders in this body. I do not wish to be convicted, though I may be guilty, of what the great and eloquent Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] recently characterized as the withering and embalming vice of consistency, but I have not been able to see my way clear to change my view from that which I accepted in 1929.

I will say to my Democratic brethren who are supporting this proposal that they have not answered the arguments which they made in 1929. I will also say—and it surprised me—that the arguments made in 1929 by the great Democratic Senators seem to have converted the Republican brethren so that they have changed their position.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. ADAMS. I am glad to yield.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is speaking in generalizations as to the attitude of Senators on the Republican side at that time?

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator will agree with me that my statement is correct in a general way, will he not?

Mr. BORAH. Generally, but not exactly.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I have recently reread the debates of 1929, and I am now going to read, really as my statement upon this bill, extracts from a speech delivered at that time by one of the great leaders of my party who now sits in the Senate but who shall be nameless so far as my quotation is concerned. I quote:

> When the framers of the Constitution met in Philadelphia to determine the character of the new government they were about to set up they sought to divide its powers into three branches. The first was the legislative, to make the laws; the second was the executive, to enforce them; and the third was the judicial, to interpret them.
> These men remembered that the Revolution had been fought over the power of the King to tax the people without giving them a voice in the determination of the question. They remembered that the Colonies had suffered from the effects of legislation in which they were not consulted.
> Therefore they wrote into the Constitution this language:
> "All legislative power herein granted"—

I have to correct the orator's language, because he did not correctly quote the Constitution. I am quoting it correctly:

> All legislative power herein granted—

The words "herein granted" were omitted by this Senator, as they have been omitted in a recent document.

> All legislative power herein granted shall be vested in a Congress, which shall consist of a Senate and a House of Representatives.
> What did they mean by "legislative power"? They meant the power to adopt any rule or law by which the people were to be governed. They meant by this to confer upon the branch of the Government chosen by and responsible to the people the exclusive right to legislate into existence rules of action by which they were to be governed.
> The levying of taxes in any form is legislation, and is so recognized in every parliamentary government in the world and in every State in the American Union.
> Hence, we ask ourselves and the country the question, How can Congress with propriety attempt to surrender a responsibility which has always rested upon it and delegate that responsibility to the head of the Government, or any subordinate of it? How can the chosen representatives of the people seek to shirk this duty by attempting to shift it to other shoulders? And if they had the power to do it, why ought they be permitted to do it?
> In objecting to this delegation of power from Congress to the President, we stand upon the broad foundations of the Constitution under which this Nation has witnessed the most remarkable development and expansion which has occurred in the history of mankind. The Constitution has been changed in many particulars since written; but it has never been changed by so much as a syllable in respect to the power and responsibility of Congress over legislation and taxation.
> Not only do we insist that Congress has no right to confer upon the President the power to tax the people, but we insist that it is unwise to do it, no matter who the President may be or what party he may belong to. This fight is not a fight over personalities. It has no more reference to Mr. Hoover than to Mr. Coolidge or Mr. Wilson, or any President who may be elected in the future. It is no answer to our objection to say that the power will not be abused by any particular President. We think it has been abused in several instances in the past, and we have no assurance that it may not be abused at some time in the future.
> And if it is legal and wise to authorize the President to change the tax rates 50 percent, why not go the whole length and empower him to change them at will? And if we can delegate to him the power to levy or to change tax rates in a tariff bill, why not go on to the logical conclusion of the proposition and authorize him to levy all forms of taxes, including income taxes, excise taxes, and every other form of tax?
> It is claimed that Congress is slow of action, and that it cannot function rapidly enough for those who are in a hurry.
> It is also claimed that in the nature of the case, Congress cannot obtain the detailed information on thousands of items in a tariff bill with sufficient promptness and accuracy to enable it to legislate swiftly; and that, therefore, the President, who can be swift on occasion, ought to be clothed with the power to act in a hurry.
>
> The President has no more time for personal investigation than has Congress. With his multitude of duties he cannot make the investigations upon which he acts. The Tariff Commission makes the investigations in either case. We propose that the Tariff Commission shall report its facts and its recommendations to Congress through the President, and that Congress shall determine what increases or reductions shall be made.
> I contend that Congress can and does act with promptness when there is emergent occasion for it.
> In 1893 Congress passed a tariff bill in less than 6 months.
> In 1911 it passed a tariff bill in 4 months.
> In 1911 it passed another tariff bill dealing with wool in 2 months.
> In 1911 it passed another tariff bill dealing with cotton in less than 1 month.
> In 1921 it passed a tariff bill in less than 2 months.
> In 1921 Congress passed another tariff bill in less than 6 weeks.
> It has become fashionable in some quarters to denounce Congress and to charge it with incompetence, interminable delays, and with logrolling processes in the making of tariff bills.
>
> In the very nature of popular government, legislative bodies are frequently cumbersome and slow as compared to the quick decisions of men dealing with their private business. But should legislative bodies be abolished or belittled because they insist that important matters affecting the people shall be openly discussed?
> There is not a single governor of any State among the 48 who has the power to tax the people of his State. That power belongs to the State legislature. The governor cannot change the rates of taxation. He cannot raise or lower rates. And there is no legislature in any State which would be willing to give to the governor the power of taxation. That power the people have always retained in their own hands through their elected representatives.

We object, therefore, to this transfer of power from Congress to the President—

Because it is in violation of the Constitution.

Because it is unwise as a matter of policy.

Because taxes levied by Congress are levied in the open.

Because taxes levied by the Executive are levied in secret.

Because the extension of this power, even if in part legal or wise, would lead to its illegal and unwise expansion in the future.

Because the people are entitled to the opportunity to hold their chosen representatives responsible for the manner in which they levy taxes upon them and expend the money after it is levied.

* * * * * * *

It is for this sound, fundamental, well-stated principle that we are fighting. We are seeking to maintain the foundations of parliamentary government. We are seeking to preserve the only kind of taxation that is not tyranny, which is taxation with representation, taxation which is imposed upon the people by their chosen agents in the Congress which they have established, and which is their only free and open forum.

That represents the faith which sunk into my soul in 1929. It is the faith which I hold today, and I say that speech, that message, has not been answered.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. In view of circumstances of the past week and the further fact that the able Senator mentioned my name, would he be so kind as to assure the Senate that whomsoever delivered that speech, it was not I? [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I will say that the Senator speaks the truth, but I think no Senator should hesitate to claim that speech. I think it is a remarkable speech, a very pertinent speech.

Mr. ASHURST. I did not deliver it.

Mr. ADAMS. I so understand; but if anyone in this body could have delivered a better speech, I know it would have been the Senator from Arizona. I am confident at the same time that had he made a speech in 1929 it would have paralleled the thoughts and reached the conclusions set forth in the speech from which I have quoted.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator for his graciousness, but will he give definite assurance that I did not make that speech? [Laughter.] I think I am entitled to that consideration in view of happenings of the past week. [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMS. I recall that a day or two ago the distinguished and eloquent Senator from Arizona was asked if he had not made a certain speech or comment which was then read. The Senator said, as I recall, "I did not read it, but of course the rhetoric identifies me as the author."

I think the Senator's speech would have been different in phraseology than the one I have quoted. I hesitate to say, and yet I take the chance of saying, that the Senator's speech probably would have been more beautiful in its ornamentation, in its eloquence, and in its illustrations; so I think that of itself demonstrates that this was not the Senator's speech.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, after that bouquet I am content. [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, just one or two feeble words of my own.

Every trade agreement operates to repeal or amend an existing statute. It is said that the formulation and the signing of a trade agreement is not legislation; but I point out that I think without exception every trade agreement, and every part of it, is in and of itself either the repeal or the amendment of law. I have difficulty in agreeing with the conclusion that we may repeal laws and yet not be legislating.

Mr. President, the arguments for and against this proposal have been very ably presented. The eloquent Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] has presented the views of the section of country from which I come, and I merely supplement what he had to say by a brief statement. Trade agreements, in order to obtain something from a foreign country, necessarily give something to the foreign country. In trades something must be given as well as something received. It so happens that in the trade agreements as they have been made, my section of the country has been the place from which the negotiators took a quid pro quo to give to the foreign country. Naturally that must be done. It also happens that the section of country from which I come is interested in American markets. We have asked, from time to time, that we be protected in our American markets. In Congress we have struggled to set up tariff walls against external commerce in order that our products might enjoy the American market. The trade agreements, in their operation upon our section of the country, are taking down the protection which has been built up to give to us the American market.

It may be, as has been said, that up to this hour we have not been hurt by the trade agreements in reference to our cattle and sugar industries; but the principle has been established. The practice exists. We may not have been traded down the river up to this time, but we have no protection when the next agreement is made.

Therefore, some of us oppose these trade agreements because in their essence some section of the country will be seriously damaged, and those who represent that section will not have the opportunity of presenting their objections upon the floor of the body to which is given, under the Constitution, the power to levy taxes.

Mr. President, briefly, that is what I have to say.

The Members of the Senate will realize that one who is somewhat of a novice in legislative affairs may be forgiven for following the leaders of his party, and perhaps for feeling somewhat lonesome when he finds that they have gone off and left him, and not only have left him but have left him in a group of Members on the other side of the aisle—strange company which rather makes it necessary not to apologize but to explain.

One further word:

Cordell Hull will not always be the Secretary of State. Franklin Roosevelt will not always be the President of the United States. I am unwilling that the power of taxation shall be put in the hands of the unknowns who in the future may occupy those places.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 1, after line 8, it is proposed to insert the following new section:

SEC. 3 (a) Hereafter, before any such foreign-trade agreement is concluded or renewed or extended with any foreign government or instrumentality thereof under the provisions of such act, as amended, reasonable public notice of the intention to negotiate or renew or extend such an agreement with such government or instrumentality shall be given, together with a list of the commodities under consideration; but in no event shall such public notice be less than 30 days. Any interested person shall be given an opportunity at a public hearing to present his views to the President, or to such agency as the President may designate, under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe; and before concluding or renewing or extending any such agreement the President shall seek information and advice with respect thereto from the United States Tariff Commission, the Departments of State, Agriculture, and Commerce, and from such other sources as he may deem appropriate.

(b) Section 4 of the act entitled "An act to amend the Tariff Act of 1930", approved June 12, 1934, is hereby repealed.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, the amendment is a very simple one. It provides for exactly two principles:

No. 1: That public notice of 30 days shall be given as to the commodities under consideration and the particular agreement under consideration at a particular time.

No. 2: That if a protest is received, a public hearing is mandatory.

Both of those are sound American principles. They are merely the opportunity to be heard and the opportunity to state your case.

I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, what the Senator from New Hampshire seeks to do is practically what is now being done under the rules and regulations prescribed for these negotiations. Public notice is given, public hearings are held; and the whole consideration of the subject, so far as the public is concerned, has been broadened.

I hope the amendment will be rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, referring to the amendment which was offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] with reference to the cost of production, and which was adopted, I voted on the prevailing side, by duress. I now move to reconsider the vote by which that amendment was adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], on page 1, line 8, was agreed to.

Mr. PEPPER. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MCNARY. I also call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRNES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], which I transfer to the junior Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MCNARY. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] would vote "nay" if present and voting.

Mr. LEWIS. I announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. DONAHEY] is detained from the Senate on account of illness.

The senior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] and the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] are absent attending the funeral of the late Representative Buchanan.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE], the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] are unavoidably detained.

Mr. BYRD. My colleague the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] is detained from the Senate because of illness. He has a general pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD].

The result was—yeas 43, nays 37, as follows:

YEAS—43

Ashurst	Caraway	Herring	Radcliffe
Bachman	Clark	Hughes	Reynolds

So Mr. HARRISON's motion to reconsider the vote whereby Mr. PEPPER's amendment was adopted was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now recurs on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER].

Mr. MCNARY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRNES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], which I transfer to the junior Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO], and vote "nay."

Mr. HATCH (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], who is unavoidably detained. If the Senator from Alabama were present and voting, he would vote "nay." If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. I announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. DONAHEY] is detained from the Senate on account of illness.

The senior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] and the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] are absent attending the funeral of the late Representative Buchanan.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE], the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] are unavoidably detained.

NOT VOTING—14

Bankhead	Gillette	McAdoo	Tydings
Bulkley	Glass	Sheppard	Wagner
Connally	Hale	Shipstead

So Mr. PEPPER's amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there are no further amendments to be offered, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the joint resolution pass?

Mr. MCNARY. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MCNARY. I again announce the absence of the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. LEWIS. I announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY], the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO], and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] are necessarily detained from the Senate. I am advised that if present and voting the Senators named would vote "yea."

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. DONAHEY] is detained from the Senate by illness.

The senior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] and the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] are absent, attending the funeral of the late Representative Buchanan.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] are unavoidably detained.

RETIREMENT PRIVILEGE FOR SUPREME COURT JUSTICES

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2518) to provide for retirement of Justices of the Supreme Court.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if it is his desire to take up the bill for consideration tomorrow?

Mr. McCARRAN. Yes; that will be my desire.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, if the bill is taken up now, it is my intention to ask for an executive session and then recess until tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nevada.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 2518) to provide for retirement of Justices of the Supreme Court.

INVESTIGATION OF WATER RESOURCES OF ARID LAND STATES

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a resolution (S. Res. 65) which was reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate on the 24th instant. It provides for an investigation of the water resources of arid and irrigable States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DUFFY in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may I inquire if it was a unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. BYRNES. It was.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution (S. Res. 65) submitted by Mr. BANKHEAD on January 19, 1937, which had been reported from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation on the first instant with an amendment, referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and reported from that committee on the 24th instant without additional amendment.

The amendment of the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation was, on page 1, lines 1 to 8, to strike out:

That the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, or a duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to make a complete investigation with respect to proposed legislation providing for the ultimate utilization of the water resources of the arid and irrigable States, including irrigation and reclamation, improvement of navigation, flood control, and power development.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

That the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized during the sessions or recesses of the Seventy-fifth Congress to make investigations into the development of irrigation and reclamation and the utilization of the water resources of the arid-land States.

So as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized during the sessions or recesses of the Seventy-fifth Congress to make investigations into the development of irrigation and reclamation and the utilization of the water resources of the arid land States. For the purposes of this resolution such committee or subcommittee is authorized to hold hearings, to sit and act at such times and places within the United States, and to employ such clerical and stenographic assistance as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic service to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The committee or subcommittee is further authorized to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to take testimony, and the expense attendant upon the work of the committee or subcommittee shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, but shall not exceed $5,000. Such committee or subcommittee shall make a report of the results of such investigation with recommendations to the Seventy-fifth Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

SENATORS FROM FLORIDA

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, on the opening day of this session two duly elected Senators from Florida took the oath of office, both of them having been elected on the same day. There was no rule or precedent to guide the Senate in determining which of those Senators should be designated as the senior Senator from Florida and which as the junior Senator from Florida.

A few days ago one of those Senators [Mr. PEPPER] issued a statement very graciously waiving whatever rights he might have to the honor of being known and designated as the senior Senator from Florida. The other Senator from Florida [Mr. ANDREWS] also issued a statement. For the information of the Senate and readers of the RECORD, as well as to have in the RECORD an example of gracious courtesy and good fellowship between Senators, I think that the statements of the two Senators from Florida should be printed in the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent that that may be done.

There being no objection, the statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

There has been considerable speculation in the press and among the friends of Senator ANDREWS and myself as to which of us is the senior Senator. It has probably worried Senator ANDREWS and myself less than anybody else, because there is, of course, no difference in the two places; our relations are extremely cordial, and we are so busy trying to do the best we can for the people of our State that we do not have much time to think about empty formalities.

I am informed that our situation is without precedent in our history. Although I was first nominated, both of us were elected and sworn in at exactly the same time, so that neither of us really has seniority of service. But to put the matter at rest, without saying anything at all to Senator ANDREWS about it, I think that Senator ANDREWS, being the older man than I, and certainly a very fine and gracious gentleman, should have the honor of being called the senior Senator.

It is, therefore, my wish that this honor, which he will bear with becoming dignity, shall be his.

CLAUDE PEPPER.

FEBRUARY 20, 1937.

I have just learned of Senator PEPPER's statement relinquishing any claim that he had to being senior Senator from the State of Florida. This is a nice gesture on the part of Senator PEPPER.

We have not discussed it, and our relations have been, and will continue to be, pleasant, both working together for the common good.

C. O. ANDREWS.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORT OF APPROPRIATIONS COMMITTEE

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported favorably the nomination of A. P. Morgan, Jr., of Alabama, to be State administrator for Alabama in the Works Progress Administration, vice Thad Holt, resigned, which was ordered to be placed on the Executive Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state in order the nominations on the calendar.

THE JUDICIARY

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Alfred P. Murrah to be United States district judge, eastern, northern, and western districts of Oklahoma.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

WORKS PROGRESS ADMINISTRATION

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of George Keller to be State administrator for Iowa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations of postmasters on the calendar be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. That completes the calendar.

RECESS

The Senate resumed legislative session.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 57 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Friday, February 26, 1937, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1937

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Thou, O Lord, art high above all the earth; Thou art exalted above all gods. We thank Thee for light that is sown for the righteous and gladness for the upright in heart. We pray for mastery over circumstances and for wisdom to execute the duties of our commission. Heavenly Father, may we be steadfast in hope, errorless in purpose, breathing forth the love and power that make men great. Lead us, we beseech Thee, beyond the peradventure of a doubt, and bless us with the real presence of the Divine; quicken our souls; inspire right motives; stir our imaginations with the lure of the unseen; and challenge our minds with adventure for exalted moral ideals. O Lord of Life, may there be no steps between Thee and us. In our Savior's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE JUDICIARY

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD at this point by the insertion of a supplemental statement of my own to that given by the Progressive-Farmer-Labor joint convention relative to the Federal Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. What organization is this to which the gentleman referred?

Mr. SAUTHOFF. I said that it is a supplemental statement of my own in regard to a statement filed last week by the Progressive-Farmer-Labor organization.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. And this statement is the gentleman's own statement?

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement referred to is as follows:

The President has offered a plan for the improvement of the Federal judiciary. This plan, unfortunately, is a temporary expedient for the purposes of his administration and does not represent statesmanship adequate for our future needs. I shall support this program of the President, but I shall do so with regret that a better program has not been formulated as a permanent solution.

I believe that the Progressive Party of Wisconsin should formulate its own program for the reform of the Federal judiciary and not simply support the program of some other party. The Democratic Party has been in power for 4 years, having had full control of both the executive and legislative branches of our Government, and has done nothing whatever on this all-important subject. I therefore advance these views with the hope that they may appeal to the liberal-minded of all parties and aid in the solution of this great problem:

1. JUDGES OF DISTRICT COURTS AND CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS

The circuit and supreme court judges of Wisconsin are elected by popular vote for a term of 6 years. Wisconsin has excellent judges. I believe the same rule should apply to the Federal judges of district courts and also of the circuit court of appeals. Let the people elect them for a term of 6 years. These Federal judges do not carry any heavier burdens, nor are their responsibilities greater than those of our circuit and supreme court judges.

2. SUPREME COURT

I believe that the Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States should be appointed by the President for a term of 6 to 10 years, whatever period appears to the committee best after a review of all the evidence. Whatever time limit is fixed, it should be such a term of years as would carry it into the next Presidential 4 years.

3. CONSTITUTIONALITY

I believe that a much better method of passing on the constitutionality of acts of the Congress would be that no law should be declared void unless by a unanimous opinion of the entire membership of the Court. I am satisfied that when liberal Justices like Brandeis and Cardoza find there is something radically wrong with a law that it ought to be rejected.

Another method which would take longer and is not so simple is the method I might refer to as the referendum. Briefly it is this: Whenever the Supreme Court decides that a law is unconstitutional, the same shall at once be referred for a vote on it by the legislatures of the various States. If a majority of such legislatures vote for the bill, it shall then be the law. Such a method would take approximately 2 years at the most, which is the time now consumed in getting a decision on constitutionality in the ordinary course of procedure.

4. RETIREMENT

The President's plan of appointing six assistants, to draw salaries aggregating $120,000 a year, does not appeal to me. Assistants are not at all necessary. I firmly believe in the doctrine of retirement in all walks of life. In industry I should like to see adequate provision for retirement at the age of 65. In mental fields of endeavor, exacting less hardship on the human body, I believe the age could well be made 70 years instead of 65. Such a limit I would place on the judges of all Federal courts. I would have them contribute to a fund from their monthly salaries, the same as is now done by our teachers in Wisconsin and by men and women wage earners, both in public and private activities; and I would retire the judges not on full pay, but on a percentage basis, as we now do in the case of other wage earners. The judges draw good salaries. They are, therefore, more able to pay into a pension fund than wage earners in other fields of activity.

I regret exceedingly that the President has not given us a more comprehensive revision of the Federal judiciary. I had hoped for sound statesmanship, not temporary expediency. As a liberal, I shall support the most liberal plan that is advocated.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS

In addition to the foregoing I favor the constitutional amendments advocated by Dean Garrison and Dean Clark, both liberals, and believe that these amendments ought to pass now while we have a liberal administration.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. HILL of Washington. Mr. Speaker, because of an important engagement at 1:30 o'clock this afternoon, at which time I was granted permission to address the House, I cannot be here. I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to postpone that address until after the other addresses scheduled for today have concluded.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including a speech I made at Swarthmore College.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAHON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague [Mr. JOHNSON of Texas] may be permitted to extend his own remarks in paying a brief tribute to our deceased colleague, Hon. James P. Buchanan.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

THE SUPREME COURT

Mr. WILCOX. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, the most unfortunate political event of this generation is the present proposal for the immediate increase of the number of Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States. The raising of this issue, regardless of its adoption of rejection, can result in no good, but will undoubtedly accomplish infinite harm. The acrimonious debate, the exertion of political pressure by organized groups, the political ballyhoo accompanying the proposal, the criticisms, and, sometimes unfortunately, the misrepresentation of true issues can result only in ill will and in distrust of the institutions of free government and disrespect for constituted authority.

The proposal came to us disguised at first as a means of facilitating the business of the courts by the elimination of old men, who, because of their senility, are no longer able to discharge their duties. But as discussion has progressed the mask has been removed and the disguise gradually discarded until now it stands forth revealed in its true colors as a plan for enlarging the Court so as to secure the appointment of Justices with a more "modern viewpoint."

Many of its proponents now quite frankly and openly admit that the purpose of the plan is to secure the appointment of Justices whose viewpoints and opinions will enable them to give the Constitution a different construction from that recently placed upon it by the present Court.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is a group of liberal and progressive Representatives, of which I am one, who do not agree with many of the decisions of the Supreme Court. We believe that the Court could have been more liberal in its construction of our fundamental law. We have been particularly out of patience with many of the 5-to-4 and 6-to-3 decisions by which acts of Congress have been held to be unconstitutional. We have felt that our system of checks and balances is not quite complete because, while the Executive checks the legislative and the legislative checks the Executive and the judicial checks both, there has been no check provided for the judicial department of our Government. We have believed that, in case of doubt, acts of Congress should be upheld. And we have given serious consideration to the preparation of appropriate legislation to cure these ills.

Some of us have also given much time and thought to the propriety of amendments to the Constitution to be submitted to the people for adoption so that they may decide whether Congress shall be given additional authority to enact legislation to cope with the problems of the present era.

But, Mr. Speaker, these proposals are a far cry from the attempt to control the decisions of the Court by increasing its numbers or the attempt to vary the meaning of the Constitution with every fluctuation of public opinion. [Applause.]

There is a vast difference between amending the Constitution by submitting the question to the people, on the one hand, or permitting the Court to change it from day to day or year to year as the political parties in power may decide, on the other hand.

It is the difference between trying a case before an impartial judge or trying it before a judge who has decided the case before he hears the evidence.

This proposal is the same as sending two baseball teams onto the field with no rule book but with an umpire who is given the right to make up the rules as the game progresses and who is committed in advance to construe the rules so as to make a particular team win. [Applause.]

Now, let us examine this proposal and determine whether or not it will accomplish the purposes for which it is designed, and, if so, what its effect will be, not only upon this generation but upon the generation yet to come.

If by the enlargement of the Supreme Court from 9 to 15 members we are able to secure the presence of men who will construe the Constitution as we may wish it to be construed, and who will uphold such legislation as we have heretofore passed or may hereafter pass in this administration, then we will have accomplished an effective "stacking" of the Court. If we accomplish this purpose, then we will have done two things: first, we will have destroyed the independence of the Supreme Court; and, second, we will have established a precedent which may be followed in the administrations which are to succeed us.

If this administration, finding itself with a Supreme Court which does not construe the Constitution so as to give effect to our particular ideas, can enlarge the Court by the appointment of men who will give the Constitution that construction which we desire, then a future administration which may be headed by a Communist, a Fascist, or a dictator of any other type will be authorized to follow the precedent established by us and again enlarge the Court so as to secure an exactly opposite construction of that document.

This power, I submit, would in the hands of political puppets of an economic autocracy be used to shackle the liberties of the people. [Applause.]

In this matter we are not dealing simply with the temporary problems of the moment. We are dealing with the very fundamentals of free government. We are establishing precedents which will rise up to bless or to condemn the generations which are to succeed us. If we can resort to this method of enlarging the Court so as to have our views written into the Constitution, then the next administration or some other one yet to come will be authorized to do the same thing and secure a construction of the fundamental law which you and I and the present generation, as well as the framers of the Constitution, never remotely dreamed of.

Not only will we have established a precedent which may well rise up to destroy our institutions but we will have done another thing which is almost equally as serious. We will have destroyed confidence in the one institution which the people of this country have always regarded as entirely removed from political pressure and political interference. We will have taught the people to believe that when the Court entertains honest differences of opinion from those which we entertain that we can control the Court's action by political appointments.

Whether the Court is actually stacked or not, the public knows that this is an attempt to stack it and the public will have no confidence in the sincerity of the decisions of the Court after the new Justices take their seats. [Applause.] In such a case the appearance of evil is as bad as the actual existence of evil.

The power of the Court rests upon public confidence. Once the confidence of the public in the integrity of the Court is shaken, its power will be destroyed and constitutional government in America will have ended.

But it is said that there is no way of controlling a judge after he is appointed; that only outstanding, nonpartisan, impartial men will be chosen, and that once they are appointed they will be free to exercise their own judgment and that it is impossible to stack the Court. If this be true, then nothing can be accomplished by the present proposal. If the Court cannot be stacked and if we cannot insure constitutional construction acceptable to this administration, then the appointment of six additional judges will have accomplished nothing whatsoever, except the destruction of of public confidence in the judiciary of this Nation. [Applause.]

Increasing the number of Justices is no solution of our present problems. We would still have the iniquitous divided opinions. It would be just as bad to have an 8-to-7 decision as it would be to have a 5-to-4 decision. Increasing the number does not guarantee unanimity of opinion, nor does it increase the power of Congress to deal with the problems of this age.

If by increasing the number of Justices we cannot stack the Court, and if we cannot guarantee the character of decisions to be rendered, then it is certain that all of the ills of the present system will continue plus the added evil of having destroyed confidence in the Court.

If it is desired to restrict the Supreme Court in the exercise of its power to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional, or if it is desired to take this power away entirely, there is ample constitutional authority to permit Congress to do this. The Court is given appellate jurisdiction upon all questions of law and fact, but "with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall prescribe." The Court itself has recognized the power of Congress to limit its jurisdiction and even to take it away altogether.

Back in reconstruction days the Congress of the United States enacted certain laws dealing with the citizens of the States which had formerly belonged to the Confederacy. These acts deprived the citizens of those States of certain fundamental rights. Realizing that their enactments were entirely unconstitutional, the Congress passed a law taking away from the Supreme Court the right and power to pass upon the constitutionality of those acts. If it is the real desire of the Congress of the United States and of the people of the country that the Supreme Court shall be regulated in the exercise of its jurisdiction or that its jurisdiction shall be taken completely away from it in this class of cases, then there is ample constitutional authority to permit the Congress to do so.

But before we go too far in this attempt to upset our scheme and plan of government, it might be well for us to profit just a little by the lessons of history. The statement has often been made that Congress as the representatives of the people can always be depended upon to preserve and protect their liberties and their freedom. The slightest examination of the facts, however, will convince any impartial mind that had it not been for a free, fearless, and politically independent Supreme Court the Bill of Rights as set forth in the Constitution would long ago have disappeared. [Applause.]

When we think of the Constitution we automatically think of those guaranties of personal liberty and personal freedom which are set forth in the first 10 amendments. These are the very fundamentals of free government: The guaranties of the freedom of speech, the freedom of the press, the right to trial by jury, the guaranty against unlawful search and seizure, the prohibition against being twice put in jeopardy for the same offense, and the guaranty that no man shall be forced to give evidence against himself. Without these fundamental rights, freedom and liberty would be meaningless words and all government would be oppressive and tyrannous. And yet in the 150 years of its existence Congress has at one time or another enacted laws which violated every one of these fundamental guaranties of human liberty and only a free, independent, and untrammeled judiciary stood between the people and the forfeiture of these essential rights. [Applause.]

What has happened once can and, under the stress of circumstances, very probably will happen again. The question for you and me to decide is whether we want to be responsible for establishing the precedent of enlarging the Court and thereby changing the meaning of the Constitution every time an administration finds that instrument at variance with its desires.

The Supreme Court, like every other human institution, is subject to error. It has undoubtedly made mistakes. It probably has established its own economic views as the yardstick by which the constitutionality of acts of Congress have been measured in many instances. But in spite of its faults, it has been the one institution which in spite of political upheavals, in the midst of civil war, in good times and bad, in season and out of season, has insisted that the Constitution of the United States means exactly what it says. And while I favor reasonable restrictions upon the exercise of its jurisdiction, I, for one, shall insist that so long as it retains jurisdiction it shall be free to exercise its judgment without political interference and without the domination of any political party, including my own. [Applause.]

If the Constitution is not broad enough to enable us to enact the sort of legislation which we find necessary to deal with our present problems, then the fault is with the document itself and not with the Court which interpreted it. We should not blame the umpire for insisting that we play the game according to the rules. The orderly procedure would be to remove the cause of the trouble by removing improper restrictions, if such exist, and by defining the power and authority of Congress to enact legislation of the character desired by the people. But until that is accomplished the Court should be free to construe the rules as they are written.

Much has been said as to the delay incident to the adoption of constitutional amendments. Experience has shown that when the people of the United States want a constitutional amendment adopted they can do so in very short order. The repeal of the eighteenth amendment was accomplished within 9 months. The "lame duck" amendment was adopted in 14 months. These amendments were promptly adopted because there was a demand by the people of the United States for the amendments. If there is any real desire upon the part of the people to give the Federal Government authority to deal with matters purely within the States, if the people wish to turn over to the Federal Government the right to enact legislation on subjects which the States are unable to handle, then amendments of this character can be proposed. They can be adopted at conventions selected for that purpose, and all doubt as to the meaning of the Constitution can be removed in less time than it will take to debate the present proposal and secure its final adoption. If we remove the doubt by adopting amendments to the Constitution, then there will be no opportunity for future administrations to "stack" or "unstack" the Supreme Court so as to give effect to the passing fancy of some particular administration.

In 1936 the Democratic Party went to the people of this country upon a definite and solemn pledge contained in our platform that if we could not enact legislation to cure the evils of this age within the provisions of the Constitution that we would submit constitutional amendments to the people for adoption. We did not say that if the courts determined that our Constitution is not broad enough that we would fire the Justices or appoint others who would construe it to suit us. We definitely pledged ourselves to submit the matter to the people in the form of constitutional amendments and let them determine the question. [Applause.]

I regard this pledge as a solemn contract of the Democratic Party. It was accepted by the people less than 4 months ago, and I, for one, do not feel justified in violating that solemn pledge. Is a political platform a meaningless scrap of paper? Is it merely a cleverly worded document, promulgated for the purpose of deceiving the voters, only to be repudiated in less than 4 months after election? There are still some of us who regard campaign pledges as solemn contracts to be kept and performed. [Applause.]

We have but recently celebrated the anniversary of the birth of the Father of Our Country. As a part of our celebration we listened to the reading of his Farewell Address. There is one passage from that historic paper that greatly impresses me and which I think we could all profit by reading again as we consider this proposal for constitutional amendment by judicial appointment. I quote the following from that great document:

> If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designated. But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this in one instance may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

It is unfortunate that encroachments upon the rights and liberties of the people are seldom labeled as such. They usually come disguised as an immediate blessing. If they were heralded as attempts to destroy our freedom, we would, of course, reject them. But they begin as a temporary relinquishment of a minor right as a prelude to some immediate benefit. But "once the camel's head enters the tent it isn't long until the whole camel is inside."

The surest way to destroy our liberty is to destroy the agency which has been set up to protect it. And the surest way to destroy that agency is to destroy public confidence in it.

We are here offered a plan which we are assured is a short cut to many blessings. We have dangled before our eyes the alluring prospect of many benefits if we will just refrain from the tedious effort of consulting the wishes of the people and change the make-up of the Supreme Court so as to secure these benefits and blessings.

But when we ignore the Constitution, when Congress takes matters into its own hands and refuses to consult the people, when we abolish the judicial check upon the legislative and the executive we will have taken the first steps toward a dissolution of constitutional government.

"Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty", and we must be constantly upon the alert to prevent the destruction of our system of free government. And to accomplish this we must never let the camel get his head inside the tent under the guise of giving us some temporary benefit. Of what value will it be to our children that we took a short cut to secure the ends we desire, if in doing so we establish a precedent that may work their undoing?

There are many of us who are liberal in our views and progressive in our ideas but who still believe in constitutional government and who still cling tenaciously to the belief that human rights, human liberty, and human freedom can best be preserved, protected, and perpetuated by the independent institutions of a constitutional democracy. [Applause.]

We hold to the belief that a government of the people, by the people, is as necessary and as possible today as it was in 1789 when the Republic was founded. We are firm in the conviction that the safest repository of the rights and liberty of the people is in the hands of the people themselves.

We have had no evidence that the American people are no longer capable of deciding for themselves what character of government they will have or what powers they will vest in their public servants.

We are not convinced that the time has come when the fundamental law of the land should properly be changed, amended, enlarged, or extended by a combination of legislative enactment, Executive decree, and judicial interpretation.

The people adopted and ordained the Constitution. If it is out of date, if it no longer serves the needs of a growing nation, if its system of checks and balances be wrong, if its division of powers and authority be improper, or if its limitations be such as to prevent the enactment of legislation to cope with the problems of this age, then let it be changed. But in doing so let us proceed in an orderly manner. Let us submit the proposals for change to the people and permit them to pass upon the question. In so doing we shall assure to ourselves and our posterity a continuation of the blessings of liberty. [Applause.]

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the special order of the House, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERGUSON] is recognized for 30 minutes.

THE GREAT PLAINS PROBLEM

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, I have addressed this House on several occasions upon the difficulties confronting the Great Plains area. This year I come more or less armed with the reports that have been drawn up by the special committees that have reported to the President on this problem.

First, to bring to your minds the area that is involved in the Great Plains, I may state that there are 1,900,000,000 acres of land making up the total farm area of the United States. Two hundred and fifty million acres lie in the Great Plains area. This area may be defined as lying between the Rocky Mountains and, roughly, the one hundredth meridian. It takes in almost the entire State of North Dakota, two-thirds of the State of South Dakota, almost one-half of the State of Nebraska, over one-third of the State of Kansas, one-third of the State of Oklahoma, and almost one-quarter of the State of Texas. It is an area that, as I say, lies between the base of the Rocky Mountains on the west and goes eastward to the one hundredth meridian, taking in that portion of the States I have just mentioned. The area is definitely defined by nature in that the rainfall is limited to an average of 20 inches annually.

In this area live 4,500,000 people. Of this number 2,225,000 live on 500,000 farms. In other words, this 4,500,000 people represent 20 percent of all the farmers of this Nation, and they live on the Great Plains.

We cannot just say that we are going to forget about this area. We cannot say we will blot out of the Nation's agriculture picture the 250,000,000 acres on which live 4,500,000 people, living mostly on farms. If you think the United States does not have an interest in these people in expenditures, let me read you what that problem has cost the United States Government during the last 3 years and up until July 1 of last year.

We spent $132,000,000 in Federal relief projects; lent $120,000,000 in feed and seed loans, 62 percent of which remain unpaid due to the continuance of the drought; and the great drought of the last year cost the Government at least $50,000,000. When the commissioner's office was allowed to make loans to refinance debts in that area during the last 3 years, $600,000,000 was put into that country to take care of past deficits on the farming of that country, and that did not nearly take care of it. In the last 3 years this Government has put over $1,000,000,000 into that area, not including what has been paid in A. A. A. contracts and under the new Soil Conservation Act. It is an area that shows a constant deficit, and Congress today should recognize the fact that we are responsible for the economic conditions in that country. The politicians in the olden days wanted to make as many votes as possible, having no consideration of what was an economic unit, and ordered that no man should have over 160 acres on which to live. So they had their 160-acre farms, and they plowed up a territory that should never have been plowed. I think the Great Plains Committee of the President put their finger on that very point, for on page 75 of their report they make this statement:

> It is estimated that purchase of 7,000,000 acres of land now operated in farms or ranches that are too small would relieve 20,000 stranded families by enabling them to relinquish uneconomic holdings on which they cannot be rehabilitated, and at the same time benefit 20,000 average families on unduly small farms by making the acreage thus released available to them. The families that would be relieved probably have absorbed $10,000,000 of public aid annually during the drought period.

Let us look at the per-capita situation in this particular area. Here is a map of the territory, on which you will see these black areas, which means that every man, woman, and child in that area received $175 in Federal aid during the past

3 years. You will notice it is blackest here, where Texas, Oklahoma, Kansas, New Mexico, and Colorado are shown.

Mr. Speaker, I come here realizing that I have been somewhat inconsistent, that I am today urging the W. P. A. to increase the rolls, and that I am asking Resettlement to take care of those people, when I know full well we are paying those people and making it possible for them to stay in an area and live on farm units that cannot possibly support them. I come here and ask for money to cover an emergency, realizing that this just temporarily solves the problem. We have not started to tackle the real fundamental problem, yet the Government has over a billion dollars invested there. As I stated, I am asking the W. P. A. to help these people, because we cannot just desert them and let them die out there in that dust area.

This report estimates that from seven to twenty-five million acres of that land will have to be put to some other use than farming—either used for the growing of grass or for some other use. It is not economically possible to farm it; and I agree with that estimate, though I doubt whether it is high enough when we consider 25,000,000 acres out of 250,000,000 acres is only 10 percent.

Now, we talk about dust storms as if they originated all over that area. I am here to say that the very center of that is located in my district and in the surrounding States of Kansas, Texas, Colorado, and New Mexico. The very heart of this cancerous growth is limited to a particular area covering about 25,000 square miles. Of that 25,000 square miles 40 percent is now subject to severe blowing. That area is cancer enough to spread, spread, and spread until additional millions of acres will be destroyed.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I cannot yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It is on that very point and it is in support of what the gentleman is saying.

Mr. FERGUSON. All right. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I operate a ranch that is within 400 miles of the area the gentleman is talking about. May I say that during the last week visibility has been limited to about a half mile 400 miles away, and grass, shrubbery, and everything else is covered with dust coming out of that district.

Mr. FURGUSON. I am glad that the gentleman made the point. That is 400 miles away. You Members here who do not have the facts must realize that it will be on your doorstep next. It marches on just like a host of insects.

Mr. GREEVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. GREEVER. Has the gentleman given any thought to the solution of this matter by resettlement of these families upon irrigated and reclamation projects and putting them on land where water conservation may be practiced by the application of the principles of irrigation?

Mr. FERGUSON. I cannot cover that today, but I think some of the people will have to be moved some place, and if there is a place to put them such as the gentleman mentions I would be in favor of it.

Mr. Speaker, here are 25,000 square miles that really can be cut down to a few counties—in fact, only 11 counties—that are really the heart of this situation. In those 11 counties the people suffer worse agonies than may be imagined. They have actually died of this dust that makes it impossible to see over 20 feet away. This dust is carried great distances, ruining merchandise in stores, ruining the grass on grazing lands, causing dust pneumonia and death. It has been estimated that the dust, when it covers the range, cuts the life of a cow from 15 to 7 years because it wears out their teeth.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I was interested in the statement of the gentleman that some of the people must be moved out, as well as his statement that some 11 counties are affected. The gentleman does not mean to say that all of the people in all of these 11 counties will have to be moved?

Mr. FERGUSON. No. I am coming to that later.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I am sure the gentleman would not want to leave that impression.

Mr. FERGUSON. No. I will cover that shortly.

Mr. Speaker, in this particular area there is plenty of good farm land. The farmers have received compensation through the A. A. A. and domestic allotment plan, and may I call attention to the functions of the domestic allotment plan? It has made it possible for the farmers to contour their land, being paid for it, and plant wind-resisting crops and the plan is making a great deal of headway in restoring all of that country. If these farmers could have the assistance of some small irrigation plants in connection with the good farm land, they could live; but, on the other hand, the emergency agencies are making it possible for the poor farmer to stay on the land that should not be cultivated, keeping it constantly stirred up. Here is a good farmer, using good practices on good farm land, being destroyed by dust blowing from the farm of the man who is operating on land that should not be cultivated at all.

I want to make it very clear how I think this problem can be solved. We have some very fine organizations in the Department of Agriculture. We have the Bureau of Plant Industry, and under that Bureau we have the dry-land field stations. I have here a book showing pictures taken at the dry-land station situated at Woodward over a period of years, showing the development that is possible in that area in connection with the growing of trees, the growing of shrubs, and the growing of fruit. This organization has some real background and real knowledge with reference to solving this problem. At the very time we recognize that 25,000,000 acres have to be purchased by the Government and put back to the growing of grass, we find in the Budget that six of these western dry-land field stations, that know more about the subject than anyone else, are being cut off entirely and their budget reduced.

We also have vocational agriculture, which teaches the farm boys and girls the proper method of farming. The Congress authorized that they be given $12,000,000 for their program, yet the Budget only allows $3,000,000 to teach these people the fundamentals of farming.

In contrast with these old established organizations of dry-land agriculture, vocational agriculture, and the extension services that have gone into this question and are making real inroads on the problem, and also in contrast with the domestic-allotment plan, teaching the farmers how to accomplish this purpose—and they are doing a real job—I want to call attention to the activities of the Resettlement Administration. At the time it was set up I went to Mr. Tugwell and I asked that they go into this dust territory and buy this land that is actually blowing away and take it out of production and get it covered with grass—in this way save the farmers who are there and are on good land. They had plenty of money available. They spent some quarter of a billion dollars the first year of their existence. They had bought and optioned 10,000,000 acres all over the United States, and not 1 acre of it was in this worst dust territory which they could have purchased and in this way solved the problem.

This map I have here shows they bought 1,000,000 acres far west of the dust bowl. They bought over 1,000,000 acres to take care of the wild fowl in the North, but not 1 acre to actually try to keep this menace, this cancerous sore, from ruining the rest of the Nation.

I talked this over with Mr. Tugwell. He optioned 10,000,000 acres in other places, but he could not see the justification for taking this area out that was a menace to the whole country. His organization, according to this report, spent $252,000,000 all over the Nation, and as a result we have this very beautiful annual report. I do not know whether the Members of the Congress have seen this map or not, but it is simple enough. It is written in symbols, so that the Members of Congress, regardless of their information, will be able to understand it. They can look at the pictures and be able to tell what Resettlement has been doing over the country. Here in my country is shown an old cow standing on a green rag. I do not know what it is supposed to represent—perhaps a bullfight.

I want to get back to this point I have raised here. We have plenty of intelligence in Congress to solve this problem. We have good committees in Congress. We have established bureaus in the Department of Agriculture that understand these problems and are equipped to undertake the necessary experimentation that must precede the purchase and regrassing of this area.

What is the Congress going to do? Is it going to make a lump-sum appropriation? Is it going to continue Resettlement and let them carry out their theories regardless of their previous knowledge or experiments on the subject? If you think there is no intention of carrying on Resettlement, I call your attention to a bill that is now before the Committee on Agriculture. In section 9 of this bill you find that all the powers of the Resettlement Administration are to be continued. The proposed legislation is written in the form of making law the Executive orders that created the Resettlement Administration, a method of legislation I am not familiar with. In this particular section it states that the Executive orders creating Resettlement Administration shall be carried on.

Mr. GREEVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GREEVER. Has the gentleman ever examined into the administrative cost of Resettlement as compared with the amount of money actually spent for the land?

Mr. FERGUSON. No; I cannot say that I have. I do know that in reading their report you will find that the cost of the land, with the houses on it, seems to be tremendously high, and the opportunity of any tenant paying back the bill looks very slim.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. COLDEN. What success have your experiment stations had in finding semiarid grasses that would hold this soil?

Mr. FERGUSON. In answer to the gentleman I may say that the Bureau of Plant Industry admits that they know practically nothing about regrassing this area; that they have never had any funds made available to experiment in regrassing or to make any experiments along that line. I have asked that the 50,000 acres recently optioned by Resettlement in this area be turned over to the Department of Agriculture for a period of years to find out what are the best methods of regrassing. There is no real knowledge now.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to assist the gentleman in getting a suitable appropriation for that purpose.

Mr. FERGUSON. I thank the gentleman.

I also asked that a certain area be purchased at the Woodward field station, where they can study the development and propagation of grasses. They have no idea how to tackle this immense problem, and yet they go into it and purchase 10,000,000 acres of land without any fundamental or scientific knowledge of how to proceed.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. PIERCE. Was not the region once grassed entirely with short buffalo grass?

Mr. FERGUSON. Absolutely; yes.

Mr. PIERCE. Nature knew how. Is that grass still in the country?

Mr. FERGUSON. Sure; there is some of it left.

Mr. PIERCE. And all it needs is care; is not that true?

Mr. FERGUSON. I make this statement. I live on and operate a ranch, and I have some knowledge of this subject. The ranch was made up of land part of which had been farmed.

The method we always used was to put it in cane, keep it fenced for a year or two, take the fence down, and turn it out to pasture. Naturally over a period of years it would go back to forms of grass, but whether it is economically sound, whether you get enough out of it or not to justify its use, is questionable, because our experience has just been with 40 acres in a section or 160 acres in a section. But, to sum this matter up, I am asking, first, an appropriation for the dry-land stations that they may carry on grass-breeding experiments, $115,000, to guarantee that a quarter of a billion dollars will be spent wisely. Second, that the Resettlement Administration, working with the Agriculture Department—and they have agreed to do that—use 50,000 acres that they now own as a long-time experiment. These 50,000 acres are typical. The land is made up of small farms, and it can be fenced and used not 1 or 2 or 3 years but over a period of years to determine whether this area will come back, whether it can carry enough cattle to economically justify the amount of money they spent on it. Third, I am going to ask and insist that the appropriation for vocational agriculture, the sound part of educating those farmers, be carried up to the amount authorized in the last bill of the House. I would like to get this philosophy over, that we have good farmers, and they have children who are capable of farming; that we have bureaus that can take care of this situation. Let us try to help the man that is still going, that is still operating, and that knows the problem.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. PIERCE. Is not our first business to try to restore what the Budget took away from us in the experimental station?

Mr. FERGUSON. Absolutely.

Mr. PIERCE. They took $48,000 away from the experimental stations in the dry-land regions.

Mr. FERGUSON. The very region where this problem exists.

Mr. PIERCE. Most of the stations in this territory.

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. PIERCE. One is in eastern Oregon, and ordered the Agricultural Department to cut their cost $48,000 less in these experimental stations in dry land areas, which just shows how much they are trying to cooperate with us.

Mr. FERGUSON. Instead of giving a quarter of a billion dollars to an emergency organization, and taking away $48,000 from the one organization that knows anything about it.

Mr. PIERCE. I have succeeded in securing an appointment with the subcommittee on the agricultural bill when they consider that bill, and I shall be glad to announce it in the House so that we can see if we cannot restore that $48,000 when the subcommittee on the agricultural appropriation bill reaches the matter of the experimental station, which I understand will be considered in about 3 weeks.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. COLDEN. What program has the Government in that territory for the conservation of flood waters and things of that sort?

Mr. FERGUSON. As I say, the domestic allotment and soil-conservation plan has done a lot of good. They have paid so much an acre for contour listing, and they have paid them for the construction of terraces, and they have paid them for strip cropping. If you put 15 percent of a section, leaving an area between for wheat, in cane, or sorghum that will grow, I do not care how dry the year is, and leave this cover crop stand for protection, they get that benefit payment, and the domestic allotment plan, as we now have it, is working fine, doing a good job. The Soil Conservation Service is doing a good job. Here will be a farmer on a section who follows all of the rules, raises his crop in good shape, and has his wheat. Here is a quarter section that blows, and it goes over on him and ruins him, and he has no control over it. The fence around his lands will not stop dirt coming over and ruining a good operator, and that is a problem that we must face.

I would like to call attention to the difference in the purchasing program. This is scattered all over the United States. Here is a particular area for a particular purpose that money should be appropriated for. Two years ago I introduced a land-purchase bill asking that the Secretary of Agriculture be allowed to take this land and restore it into pasture land. The Secretary of Agriculture is empowered to buy this land under the Domestic Allotment and Soil Conservation Act. There is nothing to prevent him from doing that, and that is the only solution of the problem.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Knowing the territory the gentleman has been describing, I wish he would give us his opinion of what would be a reasonable price for the Government to pay per acre with the thought in mind that the Government would convert it into public domain?

Mr. FERGUSON. It depends on the condition of the land. It would vary in price from $2 to $15 an acre.

Mr. CRAWFORD. In other words, the gentleman thinks it could be bought for something under $20 an acre.

Mr. FERGUSON. Oh, yes; of course it could.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman probably discussed this feature during my absence, but how long is it going to be after the Government takes over this blow land before the Government can control it?

Mr. FERGUSON. With proper agricultural practice, it can be under control in a year, provided we have normal rainfall.

Mr. MICHENER. Then, I take it—and I am not familiar with that area of the country so scourged by dust storms—that these dust storms could be prevented if the people farmed it properly for the period of a year?

Mr. FERGUSON. No. The gentleman will notice that I said under rigid Government control without any idea of production. The trouble is that the people living on the farms owe mortgages on their land, owe the machinery men for their machines, and have to gamble every year on making a crop so they can pay their debts.

Mr. MICHENER. Then it is the gentleman's opinion that the Government should buy up this land and take it out of cultivation to fight these dust storms?

Mr. FERGUSON. That is correct; and until that is done, even the man following the best practice cannot live there.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the special order of the House the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] is recognized for 25 minutes.

WE ARE ON OUR WAY

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, in the RECORD of February 19, I find this statement made by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. JOHNSON] during the consideration of the Treasury-Post Office appropriation bill:

> A couple of weeks ago we had the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] rise on this floor and denounce the Secretary of Labor, Madam Perkins, in no uncertain terms because she had refused to furnish certain facts to this House concerning the strike at Flint, Mich. Now, I have watched that same gentleman from Michigan, and he has supported amendments of this nature which are trying to cripple the detailing or the finding of events so far as facts are concerned by this Congress.

I read that to call attention to the fact that it is an error on the part of the gentleman from Minnesota. No one was attempting to cripple any investigation; and on this occasion when I voted I followed the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] and his remarks appearing in the RECORD should be justification enough, if any one needs justification, for voting the way we did on that day. As I recall, the question was whether or not funds appropriated for one purpose should be diverted to another. That was the thing this Committee voted against.

Then the gentleman continued—and this is the important part:

> It is interesting to note that in this strike there was a standstill in Michigan between labor and the C. I. O. on one side and General Motors on the other until Senator LA FOLLETTE and his Senate Civil Liberties Committee, by a few shrewd questions, exposed certain matters on General Motors in his special investigation, and it is noticeable that when the La Follette investigation hit at the heart of the matter the strike ended, and it ended in favor of labor.

That is the first time I learned that the La Follette committee was engaged in settling a strike or that it was the province of any committee to use its authority, its power, to force a compliance by one party. I did notice last night in the press this picture showing two Senators examining a rubber hose with metal in the end—a great discovery made by some of the workers in the factory. General Motors is charged with having manufactured these clubs prior to the strike. For some reason best known to the members of the committee that particular committee has overlooked the other side of the question. Here is a whole page of pictures. Down at the bottom you will notice acid guns, billies, pieces of wood; coathangers were cut off and bent around into the form of a fishhook. These were all used by the sit-down strikers. Up at the top you will see a metal shield in the window, welded in, in which there is a hole where they could stick through a machine-gun muzzle. The sit-down strikers had those things. Over on the other side you will see a picture which shows destruction of the material in the plant.

DESTRUCTION OF PROPERTY IN FLINT PLANTS

In the sewing room and upholstery stores a litter of expensive materials was cut up and strewn about. The goods had been used for bedding. Many of the sewing machines were out of commission, parts having been removed for an unknown reason.

Nearly 200 hides, the most expensive kind of upholstering leather, had been cut into pieces. Evidence of its use were seen in braided leather blackjacks found strewn about.

Upholstery cut for more than 1,000 body jobs, normal bank of supply for operating, is entirely gone. Some of the materials cannot be replaced for weeks.

Hose lines, filled with water to the nozzles, made a network over the floors in the body-in-white department. Once a neat, well-lighted, well-ventilated and pleasant place in which to work, the department had been transformed into a maze of disorder.

Walls have been soiled and damaged to the extent they will require repainting.

Hundreds of dollars worth of expensive chromium-plated hardware was strewn about, scratched and damaged in being dumped around on the floor. It will all have to be listed as scrap, it was said.

Along the windows and on the roof as well, were thousands of these hardware parts and door hinges, taken from packing boxes and piled up for use as missiles in case of an attempt at eviction. Slingshots fashioned from metal and rubber, in which striker plates for door latches could be shot, were in evidence.

On top of the building you will see a pile of hardware that is used on these cars, placed there ready to throw at anyone attempting to enter. I will leave this here and maybe some of you gentlemen who are members of the Committee on Labor will be interested in knowing just what the sit-down strikers were doing.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield to the gentleman from California for just one question.

Mr. SCOTT. The picture the gentleman has called attention to we have seen before many times. Is not this the first time any committee or any organization has brought out the facts on the other side? Is that not what the committee was established for, to bring these facts out?

Mr. HOFFMAN. On the one side?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

A PARTISAN COMMITTEE

Mr. HOFFMAN. I have been over there to committee hearings four different days and I have read each day an account of their proceedings. From the way they are proceeding I assume the gentleman is right. Apparently their only object and their only purpose is to bring out facts which reflect upon the management, upon the loyal workers, and upon the men who want to continue their jobs in those factories. At no time, so far as I have been able to learn, has that committee brought out anything which would in any way reflect on the C. I. O. or any of its members, or on any of the sit-down strikers.

I should like to proceed without interruption and, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, critics of this administration have said that it had no definite plan; that it led us nowhere; that, while it promised economy, it gave us extravagance; that, while it promised a lessening of Government expenses, it gave us increased cost in Government operation; that, while it paid millions to restrict the production of crops and destroyed foodstuffs, it spent like sums in reclaiming waste land so that more crops might be produced; it limited the production of foodstuffs, and now it comes along with the farm-tenancy bill that would increase production; and so on down through a multitude of contradictory experiments, each nullifying the effect of the other.

A DEFINITE PLAN

While various legislative enactments have been inconsistent with other legislation, and while the purpose of one defeated the avowed object of the other, there can be no question, when the picture is viewed as a whole, but that the administration, if not by the words it uttered, at least by its acts, has never ceased in its purpose to remake our form of government. Whatever may have been our confusion of thought in days gone by, that purpose stands fully revealed today. It is to establish itself and create a dictatorship. The gentleman seems amazed.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. I am not amazed as to the statement, but I am amazed at the fact the gentleman would make such a statement on the floor of this House.

Mr. HOFFMAN. If the gentleman will listen a minute, we will see whether or not it is true. I assume that the gentleman is of the opinion that the people are usually right. At least, at the last election he is of the opinion they were right. Of course, there was no vote, but there was a popular expression that the people did almost unanimously find that this is what is known as a rubber-stamp Congress, a sort of a jellified body which, when the President shook it, it took the particular form that he wished it to take. For 3 long years, at least, we have been designated in that way. Apparently some of us have been almost eager to lick the boots of the fellow that kicked us around the Capitol, and apparently we knew so little about drafting legislation we were not even trusted to draw a bill. We were not trusted to dot an "i" or cross a "t." The complete bill was sent down and handed to us. We took it and passed the legislation.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HOFFMAN. In just a moment. So the President did take over, lock, stock, and barrel, the Congress, did he not?

Mr. SCOTT. Was it not the opinion of certain newspapers who opposed the President that this was a "rubber stamp" Congress, and did not the people express their approval of the fact that Members of Congress elected here to legislate agreed with the President's program, rather than that the Congress was a rubber stamp?

Mr. HOFFMAN. The opinion was rather general, and the people did reelect him in 1936, as they had in 1932. In 1932, if I recall correctly, he made a series of promises, none of which he kept. In 1936 he came along and made some more promises. Labor was told that they must reelect him.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. WOOD. Who told labor they must support the President?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Why, practically every campaign speech that was made on the Democratic side.

Mr. WOOD. Can the gentleman tell us who told labor they must support the President?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Who printed this statement that has been circulated down in Baltimore, the one stating "the President wants you to join the union"?

Mr. WOOD. But who gave the farmers the mandate and labor the mandate? I want the gentleman to tell us.

Mr. HOFFMAN. The A. A. A. gave them money which the Court held should not have been given to them.

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman is not contending that the Liberty League, the Literary Digest, or the du Ponts gave them the mandate?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Gave who the mandate?

Mr. WOOD. Who was it that gave labor and the farmers the mandate that they must vote for President Roosevelt?

Mr. HOFFMAN. The President himself, in his campaign speeches all the way through.

Mr. WOOD. Just like the gentleman told the people to vote for him?

Mr. HOFFMAN. How is that?

Mr. WOOD. The President gave them the mandate like the gentleman gave his constituents the mandate to vote for him when he ran for office?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Oh, I said I would not lie to them. I said if I made a promise, I would keep it, and if I did not keep it, all right, they could kick me out. But labor did contribute $500,000.

Mr. WOOD. Who told labor to do that?

THE C. I. O.'S CONTRIBUTION TO THE CAMPAIGN

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield to the gentleman further. The trouble is he wants to talk on my time. Labor did contribute $500,000 and some millions of votes, and they did after the election was over, through Lewis, demand that the President deliver the goods. What did he do? He called Murphy back from the Philippine Islands——

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. HOFFMAN. He called Murphy back to run for Governor of Michigan, because it was said he would strengthen the ticket, and he ran 250,000——

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I told the gentleman before that I would not yield any further.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan declines to yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN. He called Murphy back and, as I was saying, Murphy ran 250,000 behind the ticket, but yet he slid in, and then came this strike; and when I introduced my resolution before the gentleman's committee asking for information about what the strikers were doing they said it was partisan and one sided, and when I put in one asking them to give us the information about what the factory owners were doing they said that was one sided, and Madam Perkins said she did not have any information, although she had at the time, at Anderson, Ind., men who were making copies of the police reports and had men at Flint and had men at Detroit. So Murphy came back and Murphy was elected.

Mr. WOOD. Now will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan has declined to yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN. The strike came on and these men from outside of the State, by the hundreds, invaded Michigan, armed, and sat down in our factories. The gentleman from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Labor Committee, said the other day he did not approve of a sit-down strike. Of course not! None of them do. They disapprove of the sit-down strike, but they are in favor of the fellows staying in the factory until the strike is over.

The official publication of the C. I. O. has this to say about that very proposition—about the influence they have.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I decline to yield until I have finished my statement.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman decline to yield to all Members?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman declines to yield, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. HOFFMAN. That is fine. I would like an audience.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum. The gentleman is going to make some very interesting remarks and I think we ought to have a quorum here.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Oh, I am not in favor of the sit-down strike. [Laughter.]

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota withdraws the point of no quorum. The gentleman from Michigan will proceed.

A SIT-DOWN STRIKE IN CONGRESS

Mr. HOFFMAN. This procedure on the part of the gentleman on this side of the House is very characteristic of these sit-down strikers. If they cannot have things the way they want them, they will not play at all [laughter and applause], and my friend over here just thought it was a good thing, and so he followed suit. [Laughter.]

C. I. O.'S POLITICAL INFLUENCE

Now, here is what the official organ of the C. I. O. has to say about their political influence, and this will tell you whether or not on Lewis's demands the President did pay the political debt. Listen to what the Union News Service, official publication of C. I. O., said February 15:

> And its political power, demonstrated in the November elections, proved a vital supplement to its economic strength.
> The C. I. O. had been influential in the creation of the La Follette Civil Liberties Committee. At a crucial point in the negotiations testimony before this committee revealed the expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars for Pinkerton labor spies by General Motors.
> Another backfire was built against the company by a resolution introduced in Congress by Senator NEELY, of West Virginia, calling for a sweeping investigation into General Motors' financial set-up and labor policies.

Now, this is the way they settle a strike—not on the merits, but by political influence, according to their own statement. C. I. O. contributed its half a million dollars and its several million votes, and when they got into a pinch and when Lewis wanted to wreck—what?—the American Federation of Labor, then the committee from the Senate, if the C. I. O. is correct, comes across and delivers the goods.

ANOTHER MOVE TOWARD A DICTATORSHIP

The proposal to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, if made in good faith and because of a necessity or even of a legitimate advantage to be gained, could not be criticized by anyone. But when, unblushingly and without shame, it is announced in the manner of a dictator that, the will of the executive department having been thwarted by constitutional limitations, no attempt will be made to change the Constitution, but the will of the Executive will be forced upon the people, not by the selection of an additional number of Judges but the selection of those who will do the will of the Executive, the limit of effrontery has been reached.

Where, in this land of ours, will there be found men of ability, of integrity which would justify their appointment to this Bench, who are so lacking in self-respect that they would accept an appointment on condition that they interpret the enactments of Congress in accordance with the views of the executive department? Would there be any respect whatever for a court, the members of which were known before their appointment to be ready to pass upon certain legislation in a certain way?

The request, reduced to language which everyone can understand, is that the President be permitted to maintain a Punch and Judy show in the place and stead of the Supreme Court; to put upon the Supreme Court Bench puppets of his own selection, speaking, nodding, and swaying from side to side when and as manipulated by the President.

The dirty-faced, bare-legged boy in the springtime, playing marbles on the street, never even thinks of changing the rules of the game to win. Every American boy, whatever be the game—baseball, basketball, football, tennis, anything and everything—having entered upon the contests abides by the rules until that game at least is over.

Earlier in his administration the President likened himself and his coworkers to a football team, he acting as quarterback. Contrary to all precedents—and he dearly loves to violate precedents—he now asks to have sent upon the field six husky substitutes, but he wishes to retain upon the team those who share his views; he ignores the rules of the game.

What little remaining legislative power exists in Congress will, if the reorganization scheme goes through as planned, be vested in the Executive.

The assault upon our liberties is made both in front and in the rear. Having reduced the Congress to a jellied condition, where the touch of the master's hand sends it quivering into any form desired, and so having taken over the legislative branch of the Government, the executive department now turns it attention to the only remaining check, to a dictatorship—the judiciary.

THE SUPREME COURT GETS ITS ORDERS

As Congress was told it must do the master's will or witness a revolution, so now we are told, after the election is over, that the Court will either be good and render its decisions understandingly, which, of course, means in accordance with the understanding of the executive department, or else it, too, will cease to function independently.

Lacking the courage to tell the people before election that this was the issue, now that it is too late to let the people determine whether they would vest all power in the Executive, it is sought by indirection to accomplish that which, under our Constitution, can only be done lawfully through a constitutional amendment.

But, after all, are we not unduly exercised at the present time over this proposed change? Are we not "locking the barn after the horse has been stolen"? Of what value is any court to the average citizen, if the Executive, the Secretary of Labor, and the Governor of a State are to say when and where it shall function?

If the Secretary of Labor can willfully, as she has, defy a Federal statute and refuse to sign deportation orders; if a Governor of a State can deny to another executive officer, a sheriff, as the Governor of Michigan has denied to the sheriff of Genesee County, assistance in the enforcement of the lawful processes of the court, of what need or of what value is a court?

If, when the Triple A is declared unconstitutional and further payments to farmers declared invalid, Congress can, as it did, appropriate and the department spend millions of dollars to make payments on those very contracts which were declared invalid, does a decision of the Supreme Court really prevent the execution of any plan which the President has in mind?

WILLFUL DISREGARD OF LAW RENDERS COURT DECISIONS OF LITTLE IMPORTANCE

My thought is that it does not make very much difference what the court says or who sits on the bench, as long as the Governor of a State or the Chief Executive of a Nation refuses to enforce the law.

Now, in Michigan we had an order of the court, and there is no question about the justness of it or the validity of it, that these men should move out.

That Michigan's Governor suspended the enforcement of the law, insofar as it applied to sit-down strikers, is shown by this quotation from the Union News Service issued by the C. I. O. on February 15, 1937. After referring to the injunction which was issued on February 2, that publication says:

> When the zero hour came (and that means the hour fixed in the injunction), Governor Murphy had again got the two sides into conference and would not permit the use of troops to force out the strikers.

Was Governor Murphy delivering the political support purchased by the half million campaign contribution?

Is there anyone here who will justify the act of the Governor in refusing to assist in the orderly execution of the process of the court? If there is, the people of the Nation will be glad to hear that justification.

The Governor went one step further. The Governor informed the sheriff, if newspaper reports be correct, that if he attempted to enforce the lawful order of the court, martial law would be declared; in other words, the military authorities would supersede the civil authorities.

Has the President in mind a dictatorship? According to the newspapers, he was in communication with our Governor, and our Governor suspended the operation of the courts. What does it mean? Control of this congressional branch he has, certainly. Has he control of the judicial branch? He did control it in the Michigan strike.

GREAT MORAL QUESTION MUST BE SETTLED IN ACCORDANCE WITH LAW AND JUSTICE

You will never settle any great moral question unless you settle it right. The Missouri compromise and the Dred Scott decision did not settle anything. They never will settle this strike question until it is settled right. Murphy is acclaimed because he accomplished what? Because he got the General Motors and the C. I. O. together in that one place and what did they do? They agreed to talk it over.

Mr. SCOTT. Does the gentleman think, in view of the way the strike was settled, that the men, insofar as they are in the union, got more than they are entitled to?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I do not know anything about it.

Mr. SCOTT. Or was it well settled?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I do not know anything about the merits of the settlement. I do not know anything about the merits of their demands. I do know this, that the Governor assisted them in their unlawful enterprise, and that the announced purpose was to avoid bloodshed, and I do know that that strike within 48 hours was followed by violence at Anderson, Ind., and over at Waukegan, Ill., we have the same situation, retention of a factory by strikers, a break-down in law enforcement, and that all through this country of ours from the Pacific coast clear across to the Atlantic seaboard you have strike after strike, not one or two, but hundreds of them, and why? Because all of these groups now believe they can go as far as they like. They think they can take possession of a place of business, and they can keep it and hold it until their demands are met.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Has anything happened within the last 30 days to cause them to think that they cannot go as far as they like?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. What?

JUST ONE ACT OF AN INDIVIDUAL

Mr. HOFFMAN. Down at Anderson, Ind., when a group went down there from Flint, Mich., armed, and were going into a restaurant to pull out some antiunion man, the owner of the restaurant gave them a couple of loads of buckshot and 19 of them went to jail, and of the 19, 5 lived in Anderson, 1 in New York, and the other 13 lived in Flint, Mich.

Mr. KNUTSON. I asked the gentleman in regard to the Michigan situation.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Was anything done to stop it?

Mr. KNUTSON. Has anything happened in Michigan within the last 30 days that would cause these "sit-downers" to think that is not the best method?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Not that I am aware. The multiplication of strikes, of course, demonstrates the fact that they think that is the thing to do.

Mr. KNUTSON. They have the machinery of the Government behind them.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Surely. Is that why Murphy was brought back from the Philippine Islands—to do his master's bidding when the time came? Oh, laugh about it if you will, but you cannot laugh it off. It is what he did do; that is what he is doing. He has disregarded his oath of office. He told the sheriff, "You cannot serve that writ." If there is any justification for it, I should like to know it, and everyone knows there is not and that that is not right; but what is the use of talking about the court and who is on the bench, when the administrative, the executive officers, those charged with the enforcement of the court's decree, with the enforcement of the law, are told by the Chief Executive of the Nation or of the State that the law need not be obeyed? What is the use of talking about the court?

WHO WILL PROVIDE THE JOBS?

After the strikers have taken over the plants, after they have gotten in control and they have destroyed these economic royalists, these privileged few, these international bankers, or whatever you want to call them—all that lingo that you get off——

Mr. KELLER. Coupon clippers.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes. After you have got rid of all those fellows, who is going to run the factory and provide jobs? Is Mr. Lewis? How many jobs did he ever give anyone? Sometime when you are not busy, if that time ever comes, just take time to peruse this document entitled "Attempts by Communists to Seize the American Labor Movement", Senate Document 14, Sixty-eighth Congress, first Session. Read it. Let me read you two or three little things out of it, because it is in line with what Mr. Lewis is doing at the present time. Of the Communists in 1924 his organization said. I am reading now from this pamphlet:

> They desired the overthrow and destruction of this Government with the establishment of an absolute and arbitrary dictatorship and the elimination of all forms of popular voice in governmental affairs.

After charging that the Communists of red Russia were attempting to take over the labor movement and destroy our Government, in this pamphlet, on page 2, the United Mine Workers of America, of which John L. Lewis was the head, stated—let me quote again:

> The major points in this revolutionary program of the Communists as aimed against the United Mine Workers of America—

And you need but substitute the American Federation of Labor for United Mine Workers of America to bring the story to date—> and other legitimate trade unions and the people of the United States and Canada are:

> 1. Overthrow and destruction of the Federal, State, and Provincial Governments, with the elimination of existing constitutional forms and foundations.
> 4. Seizure of all labor unions through a process of "boring from within" them, and utilizing them as a strategic instrument in fulfillment of their revolutionary designs upon organized and constitutional government.
> 5. Invasion of the United Mine Workers of America with the ouster of its present officials and leaders and the substitution of a leadership of communists, that it may be used as an instrumentality for seizing the other labor unions of America and for eventually taking possession of the country.

Here again let me substitute in place of the United Mine Workers of America the American Federation of Labor, with the ouster of its present officials and leaders and substitution of a leadership of Communists—and in place of the leadership of Communists substitute the leadership of John L. Lewis, and you have the 1924 situation as interpreted by Lewis today.

Again I read:

> 6. A well-organized movement is being promoted within the 4 railroad brotherhoods and 16 railroad trade-unions to amalgamate all railroad workers into "one departmentalized industrial union" controlled by a single leader of Communist principle and affiliation and owing allegiance to the Communist organization.

Substituting again, in place of Communists, the Committee for Industrial Organization, again you have disclosed the purpose of Lewis today, which in 1924 was characterized by his organization as an attempt to rob this country of its liberties.

Let me quote again:

> 7. Seizure of the American Federation of Labor, with the ouster of its officials, and through such seizure gaining control of all its affiliated units and trade-unions.

Again, Lewis' program of today.

Quoting once more:

> 8. Conversion of all craft trade-unions into single units of workers within an industry known as "industrial unions", with coordination under a super-soviet union, owing allegiance to, and accepting the mandates of, the Communist International and its subsidiary, the Red Trade Union International, at Moscow.

The outline of the plan just given, and condemned in 1924 by the United Mine Workers of America as a communistic scheme to injure labor and to ruin this country, discloses the same method which is today being followed by the C. I. O.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 1 additional minute that I may ask a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Does the gentleman indicate that he believes the United Mine Workers of America to be a communistic organization?

Mr. HOFFMAN. No. I do not. What I said was that this pamphlet indicated that the Communists were trying to take it over at that time.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The gentleman kept substituting "United Mine Workers."

Mr. HOFFMAN. Only because the United Mine Workers are following the course condemned in that book published by them; that is all.

By a contribution of a little more than half a million dollars and the delivery of a few million votes, Lewis, in substance and effect, announces that he owns a share in the Presidency, has a voting power therein, and he calls upon the President to stand by his organization in the present controversy. Does Lewis expect that the President of the United States, because of a campaign contribution and the delivery of a few million votes, will sell the American laboring man into bondage?

PAYMENT OF A POLITICAL DEBT

If his words mean anything, that is just exactly what he expects and what he demands and, so far, through the Secretary of Labor, who intimates the sit-down strikes were justified, and through the Governor of Michigan, who disregarded the law of that State, he has been collecting for that political contribution.

By this action on the part of the Governor and of the Secretary of Labor, those workers of Flint and workers throughout the country who did not belong to the C. I. O. were given notice that John L. Lewis was the boss, that they must pay tribute to him and to his organization and, if he succeeds in his announced purpose, it will not be long before, in America, man, if he would work, must first pay dues to the C. I. O.

When that day comes, the President may find that the man he has assisted in this armed rebellion has more power, more votes, than has the New Deal organization.

These economic royalists whom the C. I. O. and the administration would destroy, at least had enough interest in the workers to give them better working conditions, shorter hours, and higher wages than those enjoyed by workers in other lines of industry, and infinitely better has been, and is, the condition of these workers as to hours, working conditions, and wages, than that of the average farm owner or farm tenant throughout our land.

A few days ago, when I spoke in the House, some Members were inclined to treat the problem as a local one. Some even intimated that it was Michigan's problem, but since the strike was declared off, you have heard the announcement of Lewis. The battle will be carried to Chrysler and to Ford, to the steel and the coal industries—in short, throughout the country, Lewis proposes to force all workers into his organization. About this there can be no argument. It is his announced purpose and he intends to do it in the same manner, by the same methods used in Michigan.

To the credit of the Governor of that State be it said that he stood for protection under the law, and these armed invaders were turned back.

Immediately the cry went up that they had been deprived of their rights, of their lawful right to assemble. But, so far, the Governor has stood firm. God grant that he may continue to protect his people.

You who sit here today and whose home folks are not now being troubled with this question, remember that, sooner or later, this problem is coming to you and to your people. When the elevators of the Northwest are tied up by sit-down strikers; when the factories in the East are stilled by those who, with force and violence, take possession; when the crops of those who live in the South are rotting in the fields because of some sit-down strike; when, again, your shipping interests on the Pacific and the Atlantic coasts are paralyzed, just remember that those things are the natural result of what happened at Flint, and no voice was here raised to call Lewis to account.

Into that peaceful, happy town, where industry was flourishing, where profits were being made, where labor was satisfied, came the C. I. O. Lawless, unmindful of the rights of fellow workers, it sowed the seeds of rebellion, of mob rule, of anarchy. Sown on barren ground as they were, that would have been the end, had it not been for the tender care and encouragement given by the Secretary of Labor and the Governor of the State.

The great office of President of the United States was used by the Secretary of Labor to protect this growth from the wrath of the people of Flint and of those who wanted to work. The hand of the Governor of the State pushed back the legal process of the court, which would have prevented the success of this unlawful procedure.

Lewis and the C. I. O., through dues to that organization, will collect many, many times its political contribution made in the last campaign. As stated by Lewis, the C. I. O. is marching on from one community to another, from one State to another. When his goal has been reached, when he has forced all workers into his organization, then will come the opportunity for the President to declare himself as the dictator of the Nation.

As Tugwell said, it is to be hoped that the revolution can be accomplished without bloodshed, and so it can, if Congress continues to do its master's bidding in this latest move.

There is one thing, however, that Lewis and the Chief Executive have forgotten, and that is the spirit of independence, the determination that right and justice shall prevail, that burns in so many American hearts.

Those who ride roughshod over the liberties of the people may, and they will, discover before they are through that others can talk revolution, that others can preach violence, and that there are millions of home owners, in the city as well as on farms, who will not see the liberties for which their forefathers fought and died taken from the children of today and tomorrow without a struggle.

My only thought, my only hope, is that this revolution comes before those who would destroy us are more firmly entrenched in the seats of government.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the special order of the House, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] for 15 minutes.

THE ALLIED DEBTS

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, when the Foreign Affairs Committee recently brought into the House a bill to authorize $150,000 to be used in providing for an American exhibit at the forthcoming International Exposition at Paris, which was to be in addition to the $50,000 we have already spent on that project, I spoke against its passage, basing my opposition upon France's repudiation of her war debt to the American people. It will be recalled that I then stated that I would have no objection to the expenditure, providing the money were taken out of "the next payment that France makes to us."

I consider my proposal eminently fair, and I am sure the American people feel the same way about it. Why all this maudlin sentimentality over the debtor countries in Europe? They would combine against us tomorrow if they dared, and could raise the money to finance the undertaking—and how they would like to get hold of that money. Then they could build yet more battleships and airplanes, train and equip more soldiers, make more cannon, and raise yet more hell. They know that they cannot put on a first-class military show unless Uncle Sam comes across with the necessary money. Fortunately, he holds the purse strings. The international bankers and the munitions makers are strong for our "coming across", but we have not forgotten our experience during and since the war, so the hell raisers over in Europe will probably have to wait until those of us who can remember the war have passed off the stage and our places taken by a new generation who do not know so much about it.

EUROPE, UNGRATEFUL FOR PAST LOANS, IS ANXIOUS TO BORROW MORE MONEY

European cables inform us that the new Ambassador from France will shortly take up with our Government the matter of securing new credits for Europe. If the cable dispatches from Paris are authentic, Europeans are either suffering from a loss of memory or an exaggerated belief in our gullibility.

If they have forgotten, we have not, how in 1917–18 we raised an army of four and one-half million men, two and one-half million of whom were sent to France; that during the war that was "to end all wars" we advanced to the Allies in money and credits over $11,000,000,000; that during the "war to make the world safe for democracy" the American people denied themselves such necessities of life as sugar and fats and wheat bread in order that the people in the allied countries might not suffer from the lack of these necessities.

Historians are agreed that America stepped into the war at a very crucial hour, when the outcome hung in the balance. Without the help of America it is extremely doubtful if the allied cause could have prevailed. Notwithstanding the tremendous assistance given the Allies by Uncle Sam, we have frequently been taunted with the charge that we did not get into the war until it was almost over. The thousands of graves of young Americans who made the supreme sacrifice on the western front utterly proves the falseness of such a charge, and the fact that the Allies, except Finland, now owe us in principal and interest $22,143,000,000, which none of them are attempting to pay, convicts them of base ingratitude and an utter lack of honor in international dealings.

Then we say we cannot finance the American farmer at 3½ percent, which is more than any of the allied countries are paying.

FOREIGNERS MAKING BILLIONS IN STOCK MARKET FROM GOLD PROFITS

That is not all they have gotten out of us. When the administration confiscated all the American gold, they paid the holders $20.65 an ounce.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. The daily balance sheet of the Treasury shows that there is $6,000,000,000 in gold certificates outstanding. Did not the Treasury issue gold certificates for the gold they took over?

Mr. KNUTSON. No. The chances are the Government does not know where the gold certificates are; the Government merely knows they are out.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Is the gentleman judging the Government by himself?

Mr. KNUTSON. That would be judging the Government too leniently.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. If one of these gold certificates were presented to the Treasury, could gold be obtained on it?

Mr. KNUTSON. No; certainly not.

Then we turned around and bought all the gold we could from foreign countries and paid them $35 an ounce. The foreigners took that money and bought American securities. They bought Chrysler for $5 a share, and today it is over $100 a share; and so on down the line. As a result of that manipulation, the foreigners have made $12,000,000,000, or more than enough to pay for all the farm indebtedness of the United States. No wonder they refer to us over there as St. Nicholas.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

Mr. HOOK. Does the gentleman complain because Chrysler went up to $100?

Mr. KNUTSON. No; but I think the foreigners have made a little too much out of the whole transaction.

EUROPE SHOULD PAY UP BEFORE TRYING TO BORROW MORE

Before Europeans begin talking about securing new credits in this country they should pay what they already owe us. The debts are so old that I fear they have been forgotten by the debtor countries; but in order to refresh their memories, I will at this point read a detailed statement of their accounts with the American people.

Country	Principal and interest	Average interest rate (approximate) over the whole period of payments
		Percent
Great Britain	$11,105,965,000.00	3.3
Finland	21,695,055.00	3.3
Hungary	4,693,240.00	3.3
Poland	435,687,550.00	3.3

Latvia	13,958,635.00	3.3

Total	22,143,539,993.10

WHAT WE COULD DO WITH THE MONEY FOREIGN COUNTRIES OWE US

Let us break down the grand total and see what we could do with that huge sum. In the first place we could pay off all the farm and home mortgages in the United States and have left over a sum sufficient to build 240,000 miles of hard-surfaced roads at $25,000 per mile, which would be equivalent to 69 hard-surfaced highways clear across the United States.

If the debt owed us by the late Allies were paid and the money put out at 5-percent interest, it would bring in $1,100,000,000 a year, which would be sufficient to give the 1,163,300 now receiving old-age pension an additional $945 per year.

There are thousands of communities in this country that are without hospital facilities. If the Allies were to pay what they owe us, after deducting the $16,000,000,000 for liquidation of farm and home mortgages, we would yet have left over enough money to build 48,000 community hospitals at a cost of $250,000 each. And yet they speak of us as a grasping race of dollar chasers. I make the statement here and now, and without fear of contradiction, that if this Nation ever falls, the historian of the future will date the decline of the Republic from the day that we entered the World War on April 6, 1917.

Think of the fearful price that we have already paid for our participation in that great conflict and we are far from being through making payments. America should now serve notice on the dead-beat nations of Europe that we will not advance them a single penny until they show a desire to pay what they owe us. If we are so gullible as to make them new advances in the face of past experiences and even if we should fall for their artful blandishments in attempting to get around the Johnson Act, which expressly forbids the sale in the United States of any securities of a foreign nation that is in default in its payments to us, then we deserve to lose every penny that we have advanced, or will advance in the future.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the special order of the House the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CASEY] is recognized for 20 minutes.

THE COAL INDUSTRY

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I have taken the floor at this time to discuss pending legislation affecting the coal industry. Anything that affects the coal industry comes under the heading of major legislation. There are two bills pending with reference to the coal situation. One is the Vinson bill and the other is the Casey bill.

The Vinson bill is similar to the Guffey bill pending over in the Senate. That bill has been reported out of the Ways and Means Committee and the Members may be called upon to vote on the Vinson bill within a short time. The Casey bill has been referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and at a meeting to be held next Tuesday a date will be set for hearings. It is my hope to have both bills reported at the same time in order that the membership of the House may have an opportunity to compare the respective merits of these bills. Very little is known about either of these bills by the membership of the House.

The Vinson bill, although it has been reported out of the Ways and Means Committee, was reported without hearing, and while a reason is advanced that it is practically the same bill as the Guffey-Vinson bill which passed the House without a roll call vote a year ago in the closing days of the session, may I point out that the Guffey-Vinson bill was reported with no hearings. So that we have to go back to the Bituminous Coal Act of 1935, which is virtually the same as the present Vinson bill, in order to find out anything about the present Vinson bill. There are some changes.

How do the new Members of the House, for example, acquaint themselves with the contents of the Vinson bill? How are they going to vote intelligently when there has been no opportunity to study reports? The entire report of the Ways and Means Committee on this major legislation consists of this scant document. There is no opportunity to acquaint one's self with the contents of this major legislation, and I think the older Members of the House have quite forgotten the committee hearings which were held on the coal bill of 1935.

However, this was brought before the House, I suppose, with the idea that it is the old Bituminous Coal Conservation Act of 1935, that was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court because of its labor provisions, with the plea that it is now constitutional because the labor provisions are stricken out. May I say to the Members of the House that the Vinson bill in its present state is just as unconstitutional as the bill which was declared unconstitutional by the United States Supreme Court heretofore. I should like to address myself now to the unconstitutionality of the pending Vinson bill.

To begin with, there is the question of coal which is sold entirely in intrastate commerce. An examination of the record in the Carter Coal Co. case discloses that, on the basis of the Government's own evidence, 42.6 percent of all the bituminous coal produced in this country is sold in intrastate commerce. Obviously, therefore, no system of Government minimum price fixing could possibly be successful in the bituminous industry if it attempted to regulate interstate prices alone. Furthermore, assuming that the Federal Government has the right to establish prices, it is perfectly clear that it could extend such power into the intrastate field only with respect to those transactions which, after due investigation, could be said to directly affect interstate commerce (Houston, East and West Texas Railway Co. v. United States, 234 U. S. 342; Schechter Corporation v. United States, 295 U. S. 495). Yet the authors of the Vinson bill, realizing that they must go beyond the limits specifically laid down by the Supreme Court in order to make their price-fixing scheme work, have provided that:

> Whenever prices in intrastate commerce in any locality cause any undue or unreasonable advantage, preference or prejudice as between persons and localities in such commerce, on the one hand, and in interstate commerce on the other hand, or any undue, unreasonable, or unjust discrimination against interstate commerce, such prices, in such locality, shall be subject to the provisions of section 4 hereof (i. e., the price-fixing provisions of the bill).

Obviously, such a test is directly contrary to that announced by the unanimous Court in the Schechter case and applied even by the dissenting Justices in the Carter case. Since such regulation of interstate prices—which is clearly invalid—is an integral and necessary part of the price-fixing plan provided for in the Vinson bill, the entire bill will necessarily fall with it.

In the second place, the Vinson bill, if enacted into law, would, I am convinced, be invalidated on the entirely separate ground that the standard for minimum price fixing which is set up in the bill is arbitrary, unreasonable, and capricious. It is provided in part II of section 4 that there shall be nine minimum-price areas, the first of which would include most of the major coal-producing districts in the country. It is further provided that the Commission shall determine the weighted average costs of all of the producers within each such minimum-price area, both those who sell their coal in interstate commerce and those who sell their coal in intrastate commerce, and that minimum prices shall be established for each producer on the basis of such weighted average cost for his entire minimum-price area. Statistics of the National Recovery Administration show that in minimum-price area no. 1 during the N. R. A. period the weighted average cost was $1.85 per ton, whereas the individual district costs varied from $1.52 to $3.18. It is obvious, under such conditions, that the prescription of a $1.85 price for either a $1.52 or a $3.18 producer (which is what the Vinson bill provides) would be entirely unreasonable and confiscatory (Railroad Retirement Board v. Alton R. R. Co. et al., 295 U. S. 330). Furthermore, statistics released by the National Coal Association in its report for the year 1936 indicate that—

> The progressive loss of coal markets to oil and gas and electricity * * * is continuing at an alarming rate. It is primarily a question of price. Coal, despite its unprofitably low price, is being undersold in many markets.

To require a producer to sell his coal at a minimum price based upon a standard weighted average cost for the industry, when such price will necessarily be higher than that asked for other highly competitive fuels, is arbitrary and confiscatory, if anything is.

There remains the fundamental question whether it is lawful for the Federal Congress to require any private industry—because the coal industry is no different from any other—to observe minimum prices in the sale of its products. A power of such magnitude has never before been attempted to be asserted by this Government, nor has it ever been sustained by any of our courts. On the contrary, our courts have clearly indicated in the past that no such power would be upheld. In the Carter Coal Co. case the question was not passed upon by the majority of the Court, it being specifically pointed out that—

> The price-fixing provisions of the code are thus disposed of without coming to the question of their constitutionality; but neither this disposition of the matter nor anything we have said is to be taken as indicating that the Court is of opinion that these provisions, if separately enacted, could be sustained.

I direct your particular attention to this, because the majority opinion of the Ways and Means Committee includes this decision rendered in the Carter case, as though the Vinson bill is now constitutional because of what has been intimated by the Justices in the Carter case.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. I may say to the gentleman that the minority report of that committee calls attention to that very decision and that very statement of the Court.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. I am glad it does.

In United States v. Freight Association (166 U. S. 290), the Court, in distinguishing regulation of private business from that of a common carrier, said:

> The trader or manufacturer * * * carries on an entirely private business and can sell to whom he pleases; he may charge different prices for the same article to different individuals; he may charge as much as he can get for the article in which he deals, whether the price be reasonable or unreasonable; he may make such discrimination in his business as he chooses, and he may cease to do any business whenever his choice lies in that direction.

In Tyson Bros. v. Banton (273 U. S. 418), the Court held unconstitutional a State statute regulating the price at which theater tickets could be sold. In Fairmont Creamery Co. v. Minnesota (274 U. S. 1), a State statute attempting to regulate the prices at which creameries could buy cream was invalidated; and in Williams v. Standard Oil Co. (278 U. S. 235), the Court struck down a State statute regulating the price of gasoline. The only case indicating anything to the contrary is the Nebbia case, Nebbia v. New York (291 U. S. 502), in which a New York statute fixing minimum prices for the sale of milk was sustained. This, however, was in a special category, involving grave questions of public health because of the endangering of the supply of fresh milk to the inhabitants of the State and is of no value as a precedent in determining the power of the Federal Government to fix prices in a private industry where no question of public health is involved. That case was not considered by the Court as overruling its historical position that prices of a private industry cannot be fixed.

In concluding, I can do no better than to quote from Wolff Packing Co. v. Court of Industrial Relations (262 U. S. 522), in which the Court very pertinently said:

> It has never been supposed, since the adoption of the Constitution, that the business of the butcher, or the baker, the tailor, the wood chopper, the mining operator, or the miner was clothed with such a public interest that the price of his product or his wages could be fixed by State regulation. It is true that in the days of the early common law an omnipotent Parliament did regulate prices and wages as it chose, and occasionally a colonial legislature sought to exercise the same power; but nowadays one does not devote one's property or business to the public use or clothe it with a public interest merely because one makes commodities for, and sells to, the public, in the common callings of which those above-mentioned are instances.

Now, it may be asked, why talk about the constitutionality of the Vinson coal bill? Some Members may say we are going to have a new set-up in the Supreme Court, but I say to you that that lies in the future. There is no certainty about it, and I do not believe there is any considerable group of men in the Congress who believe, no matter what changes are contemplated, that we ought to have a Supreme Court that would say that any law passed by this Congress is O. K., regardless of the Constitution. [Applause.]

I do not believe that any considerable number of us want to go that far; and I say here that, no matter what the make-up of the Court that may sit upon this Vinson bill, it cannot approve it. Why, even Mr. Armour and Mr. Swift, in their palmiest days, could not pack a court that would declare it constitutional.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. When the Guffey coal bill was up last year, the President of the United States sent a letter up here telling the Members of the Congress that we should pass it regardless of all reasonable constitutional doubts. The gentleman was not here at that time?

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. I was; yes.

Mr. MICHENER. Then the gentleman recalls that.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. I may say I did not vote for the Guffey bill in the last Congress. I thought it was unconstitutional then, and I am of the same opinion now.

However, quite aside from any constitutional questions, this bill ought not to be passed, because it does not solve the problem which it attacks. In the first place, the Vinson bill, while it might have the same purpose as the Casey bill—to wit, regulation of the coal industry, setting up machinery for maintaining prices so that the coal producers may find it possible to operate on a more profitable basis, assuring the payment of fair wages to their employees and the supply of steady quantities of coal to their consumers—the respective means for the attainment of this end are entirely different.

The Vinson bill, which is derived from the Bituminous Coal Conservation Act of 1935—which was declared unconstitutional by the United States Supreme Court last year in Carter against Carter Coal Co.—and the similar bill introduced in the 1936 Congress by Senator GUFFEY—but not enacted—is based upon the essential principle of compulsory Government price fixing; whereas the fundamental basis of the Casey bill is self-regulation by the producers themselves under Government supervision—but not compulsion.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. I am sorry, but I have only a few minutes, and I should like to develop my thought further.

Under the Vinson bill there would be established a National Bituminous Coal Commission and 23 local district boards, the former to be composed of Government officials and the latter to be composed of coal operators and mine workers. Upon the recommendation of the local district boards, the commission would fix the absolute minimum prices for each kind, size, and grade of coal produced by each mine owned by each coal operator in the United States, on an f. o. b. mine basis, for shipment into each of the various consuming markets in the United States. These prices would be established pursuant to an elaborate formula set forth in the act and would be based, in the first instance, upon the weighted average cost of production of all the coal producers—not individual producers—in each of nine so-called minimum-price areas, the most important of which—namely, minimum-price area 1—would comprise about 85 percent of the production of the country. In the second instance, the prices preliminarily established by the commission upon the basis of production costs, as above described, would be correlated in each particular consuming market so that, at least theoretically, no individual producer or district would have any competitive advantage over any other producer or district. Once these minimum prices were established they could be changed only in the event of material changes in costs of production throughout the entire industry or in the event of the proof, after protracted hearings, of unfair treatment of districts or individuals.

While a mechanism is set up for review by the commission and the courts of any minimum prices which any individual producer might believe to be unfair as to him, it is obvious that under the Vinson bill there would be many instances of inequitable price fixing, even though inadvertent, that the system would be subject to abuse, since any producer could be put out of business by raising his minimum prices above those of his competitors, and that there would be established a cumbersome Federal bureaucracy by which a legalized monopoly would be set up and individual initiative and free competition within the industry would be completely stifled. From the point of view of the producer this would be true, because, regardless of his ability to produce coal at a lower cost than his competitor, he would be compelled to charge minimum prices, imposed upon him by the commission willy-nilly, which would be based not upon his own individual costs but upon those of all of his competitors many of whom would be so-called high-cost operators. From the point of view of the consumer this would be so because, in the first place, the purchaser of coal could not obtain the advantages of any individual seller's lower costs of production, and, in the second place, the compulsory correlation by the commission of all the prices in the purchaser's particular consuming market to the end that no individual producer would have a competitive advantage over any other individual producer would entirely eliminate competition and thus convert a buyer's market into a seller's market.

This condition would necessarily result in higher prices for coal and, ipso facto, in higher prices for all other commodities in the manufacture of which the burning of coal would be required. In the steel industry, for instance, coal is used almost exclusively as a fuel. Higher coal prices would necessarily result, therefore, in higher steel prices and these would in turn be reflected in higher prices for steel products such as machinery, farm equipment, automobiles, and so forth.

On the other hand, the Casey bill is based upon the principle of maintaining prices by maintaining fair competition within the industry, rather than by stifling competition. With this in mind the Casey bill has been modeled upon the Federal Trade Commission Act, which was enacted in 1914 for a similar purpose. The bill would set up a Federal Coal Trade Commission which would have a personnel and powers similar to those of the present Federal Trade Commission.

The country would be divided into 24 producing districts and 13 marketing areas, upon a geographical basis. Within each producing district there would be allowed the formation of a purely voluntary cooperative association, very much like those permitted to the farmers by the Capper-Volstead Act, which was enacted by Congress in 1922, but also along the lines of the regional marketing agencies which were given approval by the United States Supreme Court in the Appalachian Coals case, decided in 1933. These cooperative associations would be permitted to agree among themselves or with other associations or producers with respect to prices, discounts, trade practices, and so forth. However, both their organization papers and any agreements made by those associations would have to be prepared pursuant to regulations prescribed by the Commission, would have to be in writing, and would have to be filed and published by the Commission. Furthermore, if the Commission should feel at any time that any association or any combination of associations or producers were so operating as to unduly enhance prices or to stifle competition or restrain trade, the Commission would have the power to order such practices stopped. Thus the consumer would be given adequate protection against any attempted price gouging by the producers.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. In order that any producers who should not join cooperative associations—membership in which, as pointed out above, would be purely voluntary—should not be allowed to enter into cutthroat competition among themselves or with such associations and thus make it impossible for the industry to maintain a reasonable price structure, the Casey bill requires that every producer and association file each week with the Commission its current prices, that these be published by the Commission, and that no sales be made below such prices until revisions be filed. Since provision would be made for the revision of such prices once a week, there would be no danger of this system being either unwieldly or unworkable from the producer's standpoint or maintaining prices at unreasonably high levels from the consumer's standpoint, in the even of changing market conditions. In addition, each cooperative association would be required to file with the Commission each week a statement of what it believes to be the fair market values of all the coals produced within its district, whether by members of the association or nonmembers, and these values would constitute a prima facie, but not conclusive, floor level below which no producer would be permitted to sell his coal unless either (a) he could rebut the presumption by showing that actual fair market values were lower, or (b) he could show that he was selling all his coal at prices sufficient to realize his costs of production. The purpose of this is simply to lay down a very elastic guidepost for the producers as to the prices which should be charged by them in the various consuming markets in order to keep up standards of fair competition—in other words, to eliminate cutthroat competition. Since the guidepost would be based upon fair market values, rather than costs of production, as in the Guffey bill, the consumer would be given the benefit of such competitive conditions as might exist in his market not only between the various kinds of coals but also between coal and other competitive fuels, such as oil, gas, and hydroelectric power. In addition, since any producer could sell his coals at any prices he might desire, so long as his aggregate realization would be equal to or more than his own individual costs of production, it is obvious that the benefit of the individual producer's efficient production at costs lower than his competitors will be allowed to inure both to his own advantage and to that of his customers.

It is believed that with the establishment of the plan proposed in the Casey bill the coal industry would be given an opportunity to work out its own problems under Government supervision, but without any rigid and unworkable governmental compulsion, thus allowing individual initiative to reap the benefits to which it is entitled under a system of fair competition without, however, taking away from the consumer necessary safeguards against prices being unduly or unreasonably enhanced. It is also believed that the Guffey bill has inherent in it principles which are entirely repugnant to the maintenance of free competition, that it would in reality set up a Government-controlled monopoly with artificial standards for raising coal prices, which must necessarily work to the disadvantage of both the producer, by making it impossible for him to adjust his prices to market conditions, and the consumer, by depriving him of the opportunity to purchase coal or products in the manufacture of which coal must be used at fair market values.

From the point of view of the farmer the Casey bill should be infinitely preferable to the Guffey bill. The Guffey bill must inevitably raise the price of industrial coal considerably above the present levels, and its inherent lack of elasticity will keep such prices up regardless of market conditions. This in and of itself will raise the prices of farm machinery and equipment, automotive equipment, textiles, and so forth. But that is not all. The Guffey bill would be but a prelude to Government price fixing in all commodity fields. That this is so is best evident in the introduction in Congress of the so-called Ellenbogen bill, based upon the Guffey bill and intended to apply the same principles of minimum price fixing to the textile industry. If the Guffey bill is enacted for the coal industry, it will be a direct precedent for all other industries. It would seem, therefore, that the farmer can best protect his own interests by insisting that if legislation for the coal industry must be passed, it be in the form of the Casey bill rather than that of the Vinson bill.

I cannot see how any man who represents a consuming district or one who represents a farming district could be for the Vinson bill. I do not believe it is workable. I do not believe that the intelligent thought in the industry believes it is workable. What will happen will be that the price of coal will be enhanced to such a degree that the consuming public will go to rival fuels, such as oil, gas, and hydroelectric power.

That the industry itself fears this Vinson bill and favors the Casey bill is shown by this telegram, which states:

> As a result of the meeting of bituminous operators in New York last week, canvass is now being made to ascertain sentiment of all operators in favor of the principles of the Casey coal bill as against the Guffey bill. To date, operators representing about 100,000,000 tons have expressed preference for the principles of the Casey bill, with a great many yet to be heard from. Further meeting of all operators preferring the principles of the Casey bill to the Guffey bill will be held in New York next Monday, at which time canvass will be completed. As chairman of the meeting, have been instructed to ask that before final action is taken on the Guffey bill that prompt hearing be granted on the Casey bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a special order heretofore made, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] for 25 minutes.

ROBINSON-PATMAN LAW

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, on June 19, 1936, the President of the United States signed the bill known as the Robinson-Patman bill. It became effective immediately. It was an amendment to section 2 of the Clayton Act. The Clayton Act, as you know, was adopted in 1914, and the Clayton Act has stood the test of the courts for more than 22 years. Being just an amendment to the Clayton Act, we believe this law will successfully stand the test of the court. This law passed the House of Representatives by a vote that was overwhelming. In fact, only 16 Members of this House, composed of 435 Members, voted against the bill. Only one Member of the other body voted against the final passage of the bill. It has been in effect now less than 1 year. Many of the business concerns and trade organizations that were opposed to the passage of this law have since that time been convinced that it is in the interest of the people and that it is in the interest of the consumer, it is in the interest of honest, legitimate business. Many of them are approving it who opposed it in the beginning. As evidence of that fact, only recently the Associated Grocery Manufacturers employed a firm of accountants in New York City for the purpose of determining the will and wishes of those engaged in the grocery trade, regarding the continuance of this particular law. Questionnaires were sent out to people who were engaged in the manufacturing of groceries, and those who were engaged in wholesale jobbing and retail business. It included corporate chains, department stores, voluntaries, and independents. It included all classes and all groups. The questionnaire contained about 100 questions, and when the answers to the questionnaire were compiled it was disclosed that more than 75 percent of the people engaged in that business were in favor of the continuance of this law and were opposed to any substantial amendment. Evidently there seems to be some reason why the law has become so popular.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I supported the gentleman's measure and I feel it has worked out splendidly. I approve of his article in the magazine Today, and I am wondering if the gentleman would take the time for a moment or two to tell the House why that journal came out so much against the measure.

Mr. PATMAN. If the one who wrote the articles had possessed the correct information, I am sure that he would not have written the articles that he did. Those articles were based upon misrepresentation and misstatements of fact. In fact, I could point out to the gentleman many statements made in those articles that were unfounded in every way, but I shall not discuss that any further than to say that the statements were based upon misstatements of fact or lack of knowledge of the subject. The law refers only to interstate commerce. Section 8 of Article I of the Constitution grants to Congress the power to enact laws that will regulate commerce among the States. It is true that we can only do, as a Congress, what the Constitution grants us the power to do. A State constitution is different. Under a State constitution the legislature can pass any law that is not prohibited by the State constitution. Fortunately for those of us who are in favor of this type of legislation, we have a provision in the United States Constitution to which we may point as something which grants to us the power to pass such a law as this, and this bill affects, I believe, 90 to 95 percent of all the manufacturers, jobbers, and wholesalers, because 90 to 95 percent of them are in interstate commerce, according to the terms of this particular law. It does not affect the average retail business. The average retail business engaged in interstate commerce is entitled to the benefits of the law, and is subject to the penalties of it as a buyer, but as a seller the average retailer sells usually in intrastate, and therefore that law does not apply to him.

MODEL STATE ROBINSON-PATMAN BILL

I was asked by different trade organizations to prepare a bill that would, if passed by the State legislatures, be as effective in the particular State passing it as this law is effective in the Nation. I assisted in the preparation of such a bill, and I am glad to report to the House that this bill, although it was prepared and submitted less than 60 days ago has already passed both houses of the legislatures and has been signed by the Governors and has become a law in Wyoming, Tennessee, and Montana.

The bill has been passed in one house of the legislatures in North Dakota, Oregon, Kansas, and Utah. The bill is pending in the following States: California, Georgia, Indiana, Minnesota, Maine, Massachusetts, Missouri, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, South Dakota, Wisconsin, New Mexico, Ohio, Michigan, Oklahoma, Idaho, Texas, Iowa, and South Carolina. It is significant that the bill has not been defeated in any legislature in this Nation; it has not been defeated by either house in a legislature or by a committee of either house in a legislature in this Nation. Evidently there is some reason why this law has become so popular among those who are affected by it. The reason is evident, if you will study the reasons why the law was enacted.

CONGRESSIONAL INVESTIGATION

A congressional investigation was conducted, and I am proud of that investigation, and I want to give to you the names of the members of that committee: Mr. SOL BLOOM, Mr. LUCAS, Mr. DOCKWEILER, Mr. MCLEAN, Mr. COLE of New York, and Mr. BOILEAU, and myself were appointed on a special committee to investigate the American retail trade and large-scale buying and selling.

That committee was appointed in June 1935, and worked less than 1 year's time. It spent approximately $10,000. It made a report to Congress asking that certain laws be passed, or that a law be passed containing certain provisions; and every recommendation that was made by that committee was enacted into law when the Robinson-Patman bill was signed by the President of the United States.

This congressional investigating committee disclosed that the average independent merchant did not have a fair chance in business in this country. We discovered that the average independent merchant could not obtain his goods at the same price paid by the large chain store across the street for its goods, although possibly this independent had joined with other independents and they were purchasing the same quantity under the same circumstances and should have received the same consideration so far as prices and terms were concerned; but they were not receiving them, they were not receiving the same fair, square deal under the same circumstances.

This investigation disclosed that one large concern received $8,000,000 in special discounts, special commissions, and special rebates in 1 year's time, that the independent merchants did not receive, although the independent merchants owned units aggregating as many units as the large mass buyers owned; yet they did not receive any of these discounts. The answer to that is this: A manufacturer would be selling to his large mass buyer customers at a price which was so low that it represented below cost. That enabled this large mass buyer to go out and in competition with the independent merchants of this country absolutely destroy their business. After their business had been destroyed they could then put the price up in the community where they had destroyed all competition and use the high price to destroy merchants in some other place. It was a system which would have eventually destroyed all the independent merchants of this country.

Another result was that the independent merchants who were customers of this same manufacturer had to pay more for their goods to make up for the losses which resulted in the large mass buyer receiving a price which they were using to destroy the independent merchants. The independent merchants had to pay for their own destruction in that way.

INDEPENDENTS ONLY ENTITLED TO EQUAL RIGHTS

It is perfectly proper that the independent merchants should pay the same price under the same circumstances and conditions as the largest chain store buyer in America. No one is objecting to that. We are not trying to build a shelter over the independent merchant, we are not trying to grant to them a subsidy or a bonus of any kind, we are not trying to give them any special advantage; but we are through this law trying to give them the same rights, privileges, benefits, and opportunities—and no more—that the largest concerns in America are entitled to under the same circumstances and conditions. It is perfectly fair and it is perfectly reasonable.

Under this law the independent merchant must depend upon their cleverness and efficiency in business in order to succeed, in the same way and manner they have had to rely upon these qualities in the past. It is not going to keep him in business but it will give him a chance to compete and will give the people of this country an opportunity to trade with stores which may give them just as low a price as the competitor across the street has been giving.

NO PRICE INCREASE BY REASON OF THIS LAW

This law is not going to increase prices. This has been demonstrated. Prices have not been increased by reason of the law. On the other hand, there has been a lowering of prices. The 76 percent who have not been receiving the benefit of these discriminatory prices are now buying at the same price the 24 percent formerly bought at, and these benefits are passed on to the consuming public. In this way the people of the entire Nation are benefited along with the 24 percent that formerly represented all who were benefited.

SMALLER MERCHANTS HELPED

This law was passed in order to give the independent merchant just a fair chance, a fair privilege, and a fair opportunity. The can companies made a report a few days ago—American Can and Continental Can. In their report to their stockholders they admitted that they were out $2,500,000 during the last half of 1936, each one of them, because they had to make that much adjustment with their smaller merchant dealers in order to give them the same price advantage that they were giving to large dealers under the same circumstances and conditions. Had it not been for this law there is $5,000,000 that the smaller can dealers of this country would not have received. That would have represented a benefit to the large dealers of the country purchasing under the same competitive conditions as the smaller ones. There is an example of what this law has been doing.

WAYS OF ENFORCEMENT

There are more ways of enforcing this law than any law upon the statute books. Being an amendment to the Clayton Act it may be enforced by the Federal Trade Commission. The Department of Justice or any United States attorney in this Nation may help to enforce the law; or the injured party may employ his own lawyer, go into court and seek, and if the facts are sufficient to justify it, may obtain an injunction against anyone discriminating against him or destroying his business unfairly.

In addition to that, there is section 3 of the law, which is a criminal provision. It is known as the Borah-Van Nuys provision and is now a part of this particular law. This section is a criminal section and provides for a fine of not more than $5,000 or a jail sentence of not more than 1 year if one violates this law relating to discrimination against his customers, or sells at an unreasonably low price for the purpose of destroying a competitor, or sells in one section of the United States at a lower price than elsewhere in the United States for the purpose of destroying or eliminating a competitor.

OPPONENTS WANT LAW AMENDED

In addition to these penalties, there is a threefold damage provision, which says if one injures or destroys the business of another unfairly the injured party may seek redress in a court of law. He may sue for damages, and, if damages are proved, the judge, in granting judgment, would allow judgment for three times as much damages as have been proved; also court costs and reasonable attorneys' fees. The large concerns that have been affected by this act are the ones who really do not like the law. They would like to be able to tell the manufacturer, "You will have to let us have this at such and such price", which they know is below cost, and which they know the independent merchants will have to make up. They want that kind of an advantage so that they will not have to depend upon good will in the community for business; they will not have to depend upon cleverness or efficiency. On the contrary, they depend upon this low price which their competitors have to pay for them. Many of these large concerns do not like that. They have been used to it. They have been used to chiseling and cheating and they want to continue to do it. It is not right that they do and this law stops them.

Now they are taking a back-door trail leading to an amendment of this law which will, if adopted, help them substantially. They come out and claim they are for shorter hours and higher wages. They try to connect that up with a provision which will repeal this threefold damage section of the law, which is the part they do not like. They have never said anything about higher wages or shorter hours before, but now they are perfectly willing to give shorter hours and higher pay if they can get this threefold damage provision suspended.

They have reason to believe that they can cope with the district attorneys, the Department of Justice, the Federal Trade Commission, and the courts by delay on appeals, and so forth. They can appeal their cases and keep them in the courts a long time, and finally when the case is decided against them they will not be hurt because the threefold-damage section will have been repealed.

The United States Chamber of Commerce came out with a statement that it wanted this threefold-damage section changed. It wanted that provision suspended because it is the most effective part of the law. They are willing to run the risk of violating all the other sections of the law and know that probably they will escape punishment in the end, but they are not willing to run that risk as long as the threefold-damage provision is part of the law.

OPPOSED TO ANY CHANGE

I may say, as far as wages are concerned, I am for the payment of good wages. I am for good prices, but I am not going to agree to any change in this law. It is working too well in the interest of the people, and any change that is proposed I expect to fight just as hard as I can. I know that those Members of the House who are entitled to equal credit for the passage of this law will do likewise. I do not believe such an amendment would have a chance in this body. I do not believe such an amendment would have a chance in the other body, and I do not believe the President would be in sympathy with such a proposal, because, if that threefold provision is stricken out of this law, then the big concerns can go back and do like they have always done before in destroying the independent merchant.

May I give you a few examples of what happened? For instance, under the old arrangement the Aluminum Co. of America had been selling aluminum powder for $1 a pound up to 3,000 pounds to the smaller dealers. This powder is used to make aluminum paint to paint water tanks, and for other purposes. The large dealers could obtain the same powder for 50 cents a pound. You know that small concerns cannot compete in a case of that kind. Why should that concern charge $1 a pound for 2,500 pounds, but if a dealer is big enough to take 3,000 pounds he is charged 50 cents? That schedule of prices could not be justified. It was so fixed that a certain few would get the benefit of the low price.

Under this law the schedule of prices had to be changed so that the little man would get a somewhat lower price and nearer the 50-cent price.

Another situation was in connection with copper piping. To the ordinary dealer it sold for 49 cents a pound. To large buyers that same piping sold for 20 cents a pound. That did not mean they could afford to sell it at that price. It means possibly they wanted to accommodate particular concerns. But it was not justified. It was a price away below cost, and when they sold it for that price they had to make all the independent dealers, who were unorganized and knew nothing about it, come in and pay the 49-cent price in order to make a profit. But they were destroying competition all the time and the public would eventually pay, and pay dearly, the price monopoly usually exacts.

Let us take the chocolate-candy companies. They had been granting undue concessions. This condition has been adjusted.

EFFORTS TO COMPLY WITH LAW

Judge Kelly, general counsel of the Federal Trade Commission, told me the other day that at first those affected came in and claimed the law was unconstitutional. They wanted to oppose the law. They were bitterly fighting it, but after a while it was decided it was much better to try to abide by the law, because there were too many ways to enforce the law. Now, according to Judge Kelly, there is an effort on the part of nine-tenths of the business people of this country who are affected by the law to carry out its purposes and its intent. They cannot afford to do otherwise. Many inequalities and injustices have been corrected under this law.

Mr. Speaker, I could give you a number of such instances where corrections have been made. In a number of cases they will go to the Federal Trade Commission and show the Federal Trade Commission their price schedules, how they are treating their customers, and so forth. The Federal Trade Commission will point out a certain class of customers that is being discriminated against. The schedule will be immediately changed and you never hear anything more about the matter. They go ahead and treat all their customers fairly, equally, and alike. This law is working so well and has become so popular among those who are affected by it, and it is so much in the public interest, that we do not want to change it. It is in the direction of stopping and preventing monopoly, and it is in the direction of preserving and protecting independent business of the country, and I hope it is not changed in any way. [Applause.]

Mr. HAINES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. HAINES. May I ask the gentleman what effect does this lower price given to special groups have upon the consumers of the country?

Mr. PATMAN. Well, the consumers of the country have received the benefit of part of it for a limited time. The lower prices were formerly granted to consumers who bought 24 percent of all goods sold at retail. This is what the investigations have disclosed; but those who were buying 76 percent of the goods were not getting the benefit. Under this law, possibly, those who were serving the 24 percent may have to pay a little more eventually, but those who buy 76 percent will get a lower price, so 100 percent of the people will get the better price instead of 24 percent.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. SHEPPARD. May I ask the gentleman whether his hearing has covered the particular angle where, after the business has been strangled in the lower brackets, the condition has reversed itself and the prices to the consumer have been stepped up?

Mr. PATMAN. No; not on account of this law.

Mr. SHEPPARD. No; not on account of this law.

Mr. PATMAN. The prices have advanced by reason of activity in business and trade generally and by reason of the velocity of money and credit.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do not think the gentleman got my question. When you were having your hearings was it brought out there that whenever the lower brackets of business were done away with because of the competitive price, then the consumer was made to pay as a result of that condition?

Mr. PATMAN. Certainly. I am convinced that in certain places they will obtain a monopoly. There are certain lines of business where there are monopolies now in certain sections. I could tell the gentleman the names of them. They would get control in one city and then they would move on to another city, and they would charge real low prices in the second city, below cost, in order to run their competitors out. They would make up for this by charging higher prices where they had almost a complete monopoly.

Now, many people claim there is not much danger of monopoly because the small business institutions have been increasing in number, but if you will look at a comparable situation, you will find this is not true. They are not increasing in the areas where these large mass buyers have been doing business. In many sections of the country, in favored positions, where the trade is best, they already have a monopoly and therefore when you consider this problem, you must consider it for each competitive area, and you will then discover it is very easy for a large concern to get control. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND THE JUDICIARY

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I am anxious at this time, when we are so vitally interested in our form of government and the Supreme Court, to read into the RECORD a part of a very fine judicial speech made by the Honorable Swagar Sherley, a Democrat, a very distinguished former Member of this body from Kentucky, on the floor of Congress January 10, 1908. It seems to me it is particularly appropriate and expresses my own views so completely. Mr. Sherley was one of the ablest and most eloquent Members we have ever had in the Congress of the United States. He was chairman of the Appropriations Committee during the war.

We live under a peculiar Government, due to its dual character and limited power. We have to determine in this country not only what we ought to do but what we can do, because we have a Government, limited both as to which sovereignty shall exercise the power and limited also as to what matters can be dealt with at all. The one important original idea contained in the Constitution of the United States is the supremacy given to the judiciary. The thing that makes our Constitution unique from everyone in the world is the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States is given power to say whether the other branches of the Government have exceeded their power; has the right to declare null and void an act of the legislature of the National Government; has the right to have disregarded the action of the Executive when it is beyond his power; and has the further right to say when the States have exceeded their sovereign power. That is the greatest power ever given to a tribunal, and it is, as I have said, the one great characteristic of the American Constitution, and to it we owe more of the stability and grandeur of this country than to any other provision in that instrument. * * *

There have been times when the decisions of this Court in the performance of its great functions have aroused great excitement and at times great indignation; but with the exception of the Dred Scott case nearly every decision of that Court undertaking to lay down the limits of National and State power has met with the final approval of the American people; and today it may not be inappropriate, when it has become the fashion of some of those in high places to criticize the judiciary, to call attention to these facts. Certainly no man from my section of the country should ever care to utter a condemnation of the judiciary, for when passion ran riot, when men had lost their judgment, when the results of 4 years of bitter war produced legislation aimed not at justice, but frequently at punishment, it was the Supreme Court that stood between the citizen and his liberties and the passion of the hour [applause], and I trust the day will never come when the American people will not be willing to submit respectfully and gladly to the decrees of that august tribunal. Temporarily they may seem to thwart the will of the people, but in their final analysis they will make as they have made for orderly government, for government of laws and not of men, and we may be sure that the Supreme Court in the pure atmosphere of judicial inquiry that has always surrounded it will arrive at a better interpretation of the powers of both State and National Governments than can be possibly hoped for in a forum like this where popular prejudice and the passions of the hour affect all of us whether we will or no.

[Applause.]

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I simply want to give notice that in due course I shall undertake to answer the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN], who spoke this afternoon and a few days ago in relation to the strikes and strikes in general, unless somebody else beats me to it, in which case I shall be glad to have them do it; but in the absence of that, I shall take pleasure in attempting to present the historic side and the reason why strikes have come and why lockouts and matters of that kind have occurred.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman comes from a coal district, and I shall be very glad indeed if he will tell us whether or not, as a real believer in labor, he sanctions the sit-down strike.

Mr. KELLER. I shall tell the gentleman every bit of it, and then some.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. DIES, for today, on account of illness.

To Mr. LANHAM, for 1 day, on account of illness.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, this afternoon one of my colleagues from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] saw fit to make remarks bearing on the actions of the Governor of the State of Michigan with regard to the strike situation. I do not think any of us believe in a sit-down strike, but the Governor of the State of Michigan is to be congratulated for his actions with regard to that strike. [Applause.]

When the strike situation at Flint, Mich., developed to such an extent that it looked as though it would bring about loss of life and bloodshed and involve innocent people, including women and children, Governor Murphy intervened. When it came to the point of making a choice between a course that would lead to bloodshed and loss of life and holding up the service of a few legal papers in order to protect innocent people and to prevent bloodshed and loss of life, then, I say, thanks to the great people of the State of Michigan, who by a vote of over 45,000 majority gave us Frank Murphy as Governor of that great Commonwealth.

By his action and good judgment he saved us the loss of life and bloodshed that would otherwise have occurred in our State had the opposite party been successful in the election last fall.

In the few remaining moments may I say this:

I have listened to several talks on the President's proposal in respect to the judiciary. I would like someone who is opposed to the President's proposal to lay before this House the reasons why the Supreme Court has laid down the rule that they are the judges of right and reason. Why, since about 1918, have certain members of the Supreme Court laid down the rule and usurped the powers of this body to determine what is right and reasonable in legislation? Why have they, by determining facts, instead of interpreting the law, declared acts of Congress unconstitutional? Are they in a better position in the eyes of the people to determine what is right and reasonable? Are we, as Members of this House, as one Member admitted this afternoon, going to say that we, as the chosen representatives of the people, are not capable of determining what is right and reasonable in legislation? I claim that the Members of this body are as equal in intelligence as the members of any other branch of this Government. I claim that the intelligence of this body is equal to or greater than the intelligence of the Supreme Court. The Members of this body are charged with the duty of determining what legislation is right and reasonable, and I believe it is up to us, as Members of this body, to keep that power in this body to determine what is right and reasonable in legislation. If the rule of right and reason is to be followed, let this House follow that rule, and not turn that power over to one or two members of the Supreme Bench.

It is not a question of dictatorship and a lot of other smoke screens. It is up to the Members of this body to stop being demagogues and face the problem with courage and meet the issues as they should be met, even though outside pressure be great. I, for one, intend to face the problem by opposing that economic order which has controlled the Supreme Court in the past.

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Speaker, we have been regaled this afternoon, as we have on many other afternoons, with discussion of the President's judicial proposal. The gentlewoman from Massachusetts, in opposition to that proposal, rightfully or wrongfully, read into the RECORD a speech of a distinguished gentleman, living or dead——

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Yes.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Swagar Sherley is very much alive and lives in the city of Washington. He is a former and very loyal Democratic Member of this House, one of the most eloquent and distinguished Members the House ever had.

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. I am glad to have that contribution, and I am glad to have had the benefit of the reading by the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

In order that we may hear something on the other side of the President's judiciary proposal, I ask the indulgence of the House while I read a letter from another man who is very much alive, a man who is the head of one of the largest and most important manufacturing plants in my State of Washington, a man who, in my judgment, reflects the true progressive attitude of the independent businessmen of America today. His company is the Crescent Manufacturing Co., which manufactures extracts, flavorings, and baking powder, and which has great numbers of men in its employ. He uses these words:

CRESCENT MANUFACTURING CO.,
Seattle, Wash., February 23, 1937.

Hon. JOHN M. COFFEE, M. C.,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: It is difficult to understand why it is possible for the Members of the present Congress, in either House, to so soon forget the unparalleled vote of confidence in the high patriotism, the loyal adherence to the true principles of American citizenship, its laws and the Constitution, including its guaranties of equal opportunity to all citizens of the administration headed by President Roosevelt.

Surely, during the 1936 campaign, the administration and its every act was charged with every political and moral crime in the calendar, and every charge was pressed with relentless vigor at at alarming expense. Yet the verdict of the people of these United States denied and refuted every charge as unworthy and unfounded.

The President asked for a vote of confidence, sufficiently large to constitute a mandate for the continuance of his program for the forward progress of the American people only begun during his first term, and most emphatically that vote of confidence and mandate was given him.

Yet, within a few weeks after the assembling of the new Congress, a most vicious and unreasoning attack is made by many Democratic Senators and Congressmen upon one of the most needed, most carefully considered, constitutional and reasonable reforms proposed by the administration.

Scarcely a national bar association meeting within the past two decades has failed to demand reforms and improvements in the Federal judiciary and its rules of procedure. Commissions have gravely and expensively explored means and methods, with little or no actual results.

The President's proposal for improvement of the Federal judiciary—not solely the Supreme Court situation—is evidently not the result of snap judgment. It bears every evidence of most careful and prolonged consideration and seems to be an amazingly practical solution of a problem long pending, with absolutely no revolutionary, precedent-setting procedure to unduly disturb the bar, the bench, or the public.

Yet, within 12 hours of its presentation to Congress, many voices were raised in violent protest of provisions and of the entire proposal, palpably undigested by the vocalists in and out of Congress. A vast majority of the protestants tacitly or plainly admitted the necessity for the reforms, and many hastily conceived substitutes, and amendments have been thrown together. Every such effort is in effect additional evidence of the need for the reform.

As a citizen, a Democrat, and as a believer in the sincerity, political honesty, and the great ability of the President, I hope that every Washington delegate in Congress may see his way clear to constructive support in the passage of this measure, in improved form if that is practicable, but promptly and loyally.

Yours very truly,

W. J. KAHLE, President.

[Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Washington may have an additional one-half minute. I would like to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington has expressed no desire for additional time.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one-half minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I do not know that I made it clear, but I want it to be understood that Mr. Sherley in 1908 made that speech before the Congress when he was a Member of this body.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing in the Appendix an article upon the monetary situation by a former Director of the United States Mint. I made this request on yesterday, but it was objected to upon the Republican side. I was, however, told to renew the request today, and this I now do.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, last Monday was the regular District day. It went over because we did not want to do anything on Washington's Birthday. Tuesday had been set aside by unanimous consent for the consideration of matters from the Committee on the District of Columbia, but the committee did not have the day, because we adjourned immediately.

On Monday next we shall consider the Consent Calendar. This calendar is not a long one and may be disposed of within an hour or an hour and a half.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on the completion of the call of the Consent Calendar and the suspensions, if there be any, that the remainder of the day may be occupied by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS AND VESSEL MEASUREMENT RULES (S. DOC. NO. 23)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress report of the Committee on Panama Canal Tolls and Vessel Measurement Rules, appointed under the provisions of the act approved April 13, 1936, "for the purpose of making an independent study and investigation of the rules for the measurement of vessels using the Panama Canal and the tolls that should be charged therefor." As provided by law, the report contains the Committee's "advisory recommendations of changes and modifications of the rules for the measurement of vessels for the Panama Canal and the determination of tolls as it finds necessary or desirable to provide a practical, just, and equitable system of measuring such vessels and levying such tolls."

For over 20 years numerous attempts have been made to secure the enactment of legislation which would abolish the dual system of measurement whereby tolls are computed under one set of rules, with a limiting factor on the amount to be collected, determined by different and continually changing rules of measurement over which the President has no jurisdiction.

The Committee points out in its report that the Panama Canal Act of 1912 clearly intended to provide that the President should be given full authority to prescribe rules for the measurement of vessels at the Panama Canal, and to fix within certain well-defined limits prescribed by the Congress toll rates that were to be charged on vessels passing through the Canal. Due to the effect of the Attorney General's interpretation, made in 1914, of the requirements of the Panama Canal Act, not only has the average transit charge per vessel, foreign and American, been much lowered, and the total revenues of the Canal correspondingly reduced, but the transit payments made for vessels of like earning capacity have become widely different; and this has taken place without any change in the rate of tolls fixed by the President to be paid by all types of commercial vessels, and without any modification of the rules prescribed by the President for determining the tonnage upon which the established rate of tolls should be paid.

It was not intended that the Panama Canal rules, prescribed by the President in 1913, should forever remain unchanged, nor was it intended that the toll rates should remain fixed at the rates prescribed by the President in 1912. With development in ship construction and increases in traffic the time has come when the rules should be modified and the rates reduced. This cannot be accomplished in a satisfactory and impartial manner without the enactment of remedial legislation abolishing the dual system and establishing the Panama Canal rules of measurement as the sole rules for the measurement of vessels at the Panama Canal, and the tonnage on which Congress should prescribe the limits within which the President may act in fixing the toll rates.

An effort was made at the last session of the Congress to secure the enactment of such legislation, but there were those who felt that an independent study of the entire subject should be made first by a neutral committee before final action was taken. That study has now been made and an exhaustive report has been submitted.

The Committee has made certain recommendations as to the enactment of necessary legislation which I approve. Its enactment will permit the President to proceed administratively to carry out the further recommendations of the Committee as to the modifications of the rules and the rates to be charged in order to provide a practical, just, and equitable system of measuring vessels and levying tolls.

I cannot urge too strongly the enactment of legislation that will so amend existing law as to provide—

(1) That tolls for the use of the Panama Canal shall be based upon vessel tonnage determined by the Panama Canal rules of measurement as prescribed by the President.

(2) That the tolls upon commercial vessels, Army and Navy transports, colliers, supply and hospital ships shall not exceed $1 per Panama Canal net ton, and shall not be less than 75 cents per Panama Canal net ton, when such vessels are laden.

(3) That a rate of tolls lower than is levied on laden vessels may be prescribed for vessels in ballast, without passengers or cargo.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 26, 1937.

Mr. CLARK subsequently said: Mr. President, this morning the President of the United States sent to the Congress a message having to do with the report of the committee appointed in pursuance of law enacted by the last session of Congress in reference to tolls and the measurements of vessels passing through the Panama Canal.

I ask unanimous consent that the President's message, with the accompanying documents, as well as the diagrams in connection therewith, be printed as a Senate document.

I may say that it is necessary that the diagrams be printed in order to have an understanding of the text.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Colorado, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

Whereas exhaustive investigations conducted by entomologists representing the United States and the State of Colorado have disclosed the fact that a serious outbreak of grasshoppers and Mormon crickets threatens Colorado and neighboring States during the year 1937; and

Whereas serious crop losses will be suffered by this and neighboring States unless adequate control measures are conducted immediately on a regional basis; and

Whereas the farmers of Colorado and neighboring States are not financially able to provide the materials and labor required to control such threatened infestation, or to extend control measures through the regions threatened with such crop losses: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives of the thirty-first general assembly (the senate concurring therein), That the Congress be urged to adopt and the President to approve measures now pending before the Congress to appropriate and maintain for such time as may be necessary a fund, to be made available for the control of grasshoppers, Mormon crickets, and other insect pests similarly subject to interstate migratory movements or to intermittent outbreaks in agricultural regions of the Western States; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this memorial be forwarded to the President of the United States, to both Houses of Congress, to the Honorable Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, and to each Member of the Senate and House of Representatives from the State of Colorado.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorials of the Legislature of the State of Montana, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

Senate Joint Memorial 4

Resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States endorsing the passage and approval of the bill introduced by the Honorable U. L. BURDICK, United States Congressman, providing for the cancelation of certain feed and seed loans heretofore made by the United States Government, and providing for an appropriation therefor under the provisions of the War Department appropriation bill

To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the members of the Twenty-fifth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana (the senate and house concurring), respectfully represent as follows: That

Whereas there is before the Seventy-fifth Congress, first session, a bill, House Resolution No. 207, providing for the cancelation of certain feed and seed loans heretofore made by the United States Government, providing for an appropriation therefor under the provisions of the War Department appropriation bill; that

Whereas there exists throughout the State of Montana and other States of the Union a grave situation due to several years of drought, grasshopper and cricket infestations, and past low prices in agricultural products; and

Whereas these conditions make it impossible for many farmers and ranchers to ever repay the feed and seed loans: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That hereafter, no claim shall be made by the United States against any persons for the debt created by the furnishing of feed and seed, as is hereinafter provided:

(a) Claims now held against farmers who are now receiving Federal relief, either through the Works Progress Administration or through direct grants by the Government through the Resettlement Administration.

(b) Claims held against farmers whose liabilities exceed the amount of their assets by a fair valuation thereof according to existing prices and conditions.

(c) Claims held against farmers, secured or unsecured, where the forced collection of the same would prevent such farmer from continuing his usual and regular farming operations or the collection of which would render such farmer unable to properly protect his family under a decent and humane standard of living.

Whenever any farmer shall make written application to the Farm Credit Administration showing himself entitled to relief from the debt created by Federal feed or seed loans under the provisions of this act, said debt shall be canceled if and when the Farm Credit Administration shall be satisfied as to the truth of the material statements contained in said application.

Every farmer desiring to avail himself of the provisions of this act shall insert in said application his name, address, location of farm by legal description, his post office, the amount of the debt, when contracted, a list of his assets and liabilities; if receiving any form of relief, the nature thereof; if not on relief and having more assets than liabilities, his present financial situation; and a statement presenting in what way the collection of the debt will prevent him from continuing his usual and regular farming operation; and in what way the collection of the debt will render him unable to properly protect his family under a decent and humane standard of living. Said application shall be sworn to before an officer duly authorized to administer oaths.

Any person making false application under the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of felony and upon conviction thereof shall be sentenced to the Federal penitentiary for a period not exceeding 1 year.

Whenever any farmer shall have complied with the provisions of this act in good faith, and the Farm Credit Administration shall fail for a period of 60 days to cancel and discharge the debt, then in that case said applicant shall have the right to appeal from the action of the Farm Credit Administration to the United States district court of the district of his residence. At such hearing before said court, after the evidence has been submitted, the court shall make its order either allowing or rejecting said application: Provided, That this one appeal shall be final in the premises.

For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act there is hereby appropriated, out of any funds not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $65,000,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, to be available to the Farm Credit Administration for the purpose of canceling and discharging said obligation: Provided, however, That in the annual War Department appropriation bill for the year 1937 there shall be contained a provision for the appropriation of said sum of $65,000,000, and said appropriation shall be deemed and declared to be directly affecting our national defense.

Senate Memorial 6

Memorial to the Congress of the United States requesting support of the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works by providing funds for a public-works program, and requesting immediate allocation of funds for the construction of certain water-conservation projects to meet a dire emergency

To the Honorable Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the members of the Senate of the Twenty-fifth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, respectfully represent that—

Whereas a well balanced and orderly program of public works has been advanced by the people of Montana to the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works; and

Whereas the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works has inaugurated and is carrying forward in this State the construction of public works of incalculable value in supplying present employment and in providing needed public improvements; and

Whereas among such public works the water-conservation program in cooperation with the State water conservation board is of outstanding value and vital importance, because such works are most highly regenerative, resulting in permanent employment through providing the basis for sound reconstruction and permanent growth and prosperity of our communities with security and opportunity for our citizens; and

Whereas in carrying forward this program the following water-conservation projects have been approved by the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works and are ready for construction providing funds are made available:

P.W.A. no.	Name of project	County	Amount
1007	Nevada Creek	Powell	$247,272
1048	Upper Musselshell	Wheatland and Meagher	776,364
1051	Columbus irrigation	Stillwater	56,364
1053	West Fork of Bitterroot	Ravalli	449,091
1054	Tongue River	Custer	1,200,000
1057	Little Missouri	Carter	827,272
1114	Sidney pumping	Richland	85,454

Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we do hereby express our appreciation of the very important work which has been done and is being done in the construction of water-conservation projects by the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works of the United States in cooperation with the State water conservation board of the State of Montana; that the construction of the works which have been constructed and are being constructed is of the greatest permanent value in the rehabilitation of the State of Montana and that the further continuance of such program and the construction of additional projects of the like kind will restore a permanent prosperity to the agricultural districts of the State of Montana; and be it further

Resolved, That we do hereby petition the Congress of the United States to provide funds to the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works so that these water-conservation projects may be constructed.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Montana, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Senate joint resolution expressing assent of the Legislature of the State of Montana to the provisions and purpose of the Bankhead-Jones Act of June 29, 1935 (Public, No. 182, 74th Cong.)

Whereas there has been enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled an act to provide for research into basic laws and principles relating to agriculture and to provide for the further development of cooperative agricultural extension work and the more complete endowment and support of land-grant colleges, approved June 29, 1935 (Public, No. 182, 74th Cong.); and

Whereas the provisions of the act and the purpose of the grants of money authorized by the act are made subject to the legislative assent of the several States and Territories: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the Legislature of the State of Montana (the house of representatives concurring), That the assent of the Legislature of the State of Montana required by the said act be, and the same is hereby, given.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Montana, which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation:

Memorial developing the Buffalo Rapids project for the purpose of irrigating lands with water diverted from the Yellowstone River in the counties of Dawson, Prairie, and Custer, and further providing the stabilization of farming and stock-growing industry

A memorial to the President of the United States, to the honorable Secretary of the Interior, to the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Member in Congress from Montana.

We, the members of the Twenty-fifth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, the senate and house concurring, respectfully represent:

Whereas along the Yellowstone River in Custer, Prairie, and Dawson Counties in Montana there are vast areas of fertile, cultivatable and agricultural land which can be made irrigable and which lies in the midst of a large livestock range and grazing dominion long recognized as one of the most valuable and best adapted to the livestock industry on the continent; and

Whereas recent years of drought has proven beyond a doubt that to stabilize the livestock industry in eastern Montana, and to insure its livestock growers with a reasonable and economical supply of feed for their herds, more land must be placed under irrigation and the waters of rivers and streams serving this territory be made available therefor; and

Whereas the Buffalo Rapids project, already defined and recognized, embracing lands in the Yellowstone Valley in the three counties herein mentioned, was conceived for the purpose of irrigating the above lands with water diverted from the Yellowstone River; that the lands reclaimed thereby would not increase but rather materially decrease the acreage now planted in wheat and other small grain and would place the same in livestock feed, sugar beet, and small truck-farm production. This result would greatly stabilize the local livestock industry and would permit many farmers recently removed from submarginal and arid lands to rehabilitate themselves and likewise provide work for farmers and workers now dependent upon relief; and

Whereas a part of the preliminary survey of the Buffalo Rapids project has been completed but for lack of funds and other causes beyond the knowledge of your memorialists the said project has not been approved for final construction. Your memorialists recognize that this project is one of the most important in Montana, would have a far-reaching effect, and would greatly add to the material worth and value of Montana as a whole, and to eastern Montana in particular, and would insure its stockmen and farmers within its territory with permanent feed and means of existence against drought. We further recognize that delay in its final approval and construction will greatly retard the repopulation of its adjoining ranges and will cause irreparable loss and injury to this section of the State of Montana: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, the Senate and House concurring, does hereby respectfully petition and request that the Congress of the United States and the Department of the Interior do, without further delay, approve and provide the necessary appropriation for the construction of the Buffalo Rapids project in Montana; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this memorial be mailed to the President of the United States, to the Secretary of the Interior, to the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Member in Congress from Montana.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of New Mexico, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Joint memorial to the Senate of the United States asking that the Argentine Sanitary Convention now pending before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations be not ratified

Whereas the Argentine Sanitary Convention now pending before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations would permit the importation of livestock products from zones purported to be infested with rinderpest, or foot-and-mouth disease; and

Whereas said agreement would modify the present embargo against that country, which harbors foot-and-mouth disease within its borders, and would permit importations of dressed-meat products; and

Whereas the importation of such products would seriously jeopardize the welfare of our livestock industry: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Legislature of the State of New Mexico urge the Senate of the United States not to ratify the Argentine Sanitary Convention; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be sent to the Honorable CARL A. HATCH, the Honorable DENNIS CHAVEZ, Senators from New Mexico, and to the President of the Senate of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of New Mexico, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys:

Joint memorial of the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of New Mexico to the Congress of the United States of America urging an amendment to the act of Congress approved February 25, 1920, and amendments thereto, entitled "An act to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, oil shale, gas, and sodium on the public domain"

Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of New Mexico:

Whereas under an act of Congress of the United States approved August 21, 1935, known as the O'Mahoney-Greever bill, the act of Congress approved February 25, 1920, entitled "An act to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, oil shale, gas, and sodium on the public domain" (41 Stat. 437), was amended so as to provide for the extension of oil and gas prospecting permits issued pursuant to said act until December 31, 1937, and for the further extension of the same within the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior until December 31, 1938; and

Whereas it is desirable and in the interest of the inhabitants of the State of New Mexico that said oil and gas prospecting permits be extended by a further act of Congress until at least December 31, 1939, with the authority of the Secretary of the Interior to further extend the same within his discretion to December 31, 1940, in order to give the present owners and holders of said oil and gas prospecting permits and operators further opportunity to test and develop the lands embraced in said permits; and

Whereas said act of Congress, as amended, provides for royalty under the "B" or nonpreferred area leases issued pursuant to the terms of said oil and gas prospecting permits on a sliding-scale basis of not less than 12½ percent, and for the conversion of oil and gas prospecting permits into leases and for the issuance of oil and gas leases upon the public domain, open to lease under said act, at a royalty in excess of 12½ percent; and

Whereas the usual and customary royalty upon privately owned lands and lands owned by the State of New Mexico is 12½ percent, and it is desirable and in the interest of the inhabitants of the State of New Mexico, in order that the development of the large area of public land in this State may not be retarded but that such development may proceed as in States without public domain, that the royalty under said leases issued pursuant to said oil and gas prospecting permits and said act of Congress be definitely fixed so as to conform to the usual and customary 12½-percent royalty; and

Whereas in furtherance of such purpose, it is desirable that the rentals to be paid under the terms of said oil and gas leases issued pursuant to said act of Congress shall also conform to rentals on State lands in the area where situated with a maximum rental of 50 cents per acre per annum; and

Whereas said act of Congress, as amended, also provides for the development of the lands embraced in any oil and gas prospecting permit or lease issued thereunder, pursuant to such cooperative or unit plan as may be approved by the Secretary of the Interior or the Secretary of the department or departments having jurisdiction over the Government lands involved in such plan; and

Whereas in many instances such plans are not practical or advisable in the public interest and it is necessary and desirable that said act of Congress be further amended so as to be relieved of such requirements where the permit or lease owner agrees to comply with and adhere to State proration and well-spacing rules, as promulgated by the State conservation commission or other body in authority, and in such case to also be relieved from the acreage-limitation provisions contained in said act of Congress, as amended, the same as if entering into a unit plan or other cooperative plan approved as aforesaid; and

Whereas it is necessary and advisable in the public interest and to induce further prospecting upon the public domain to liberalize the bond requirements of said act of Congress, as amended: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of New Mexico respectfully and earnestly memorialize and request the Congress of the United States of America to further amend the act of Congress approved February 25, 1920, entitled "An act to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, oil shale, gas, and sodium on the public domain", as amended, so as to provide for the matters and things set forth in the preamble hereof, and thereby liberalize said act of Congress, to the end that development of oil and gas on public lands be not retarded, so that the development in the State of New Mexico may proceed upon a parity with development in States without public lands; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this memorial be sent to the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, the Secretary of the Interior of the United States, and to the respective Senators and Representatives of New Mexico in the Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution of the General Court of Massachusetts, protesting against the enactment of legislation to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(See resolution printed in full when presented by Mr. WALSH on the 25th instant, p. 1584, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD).

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution of the General Court of Massachusetts, favoring an amendment to the Constitution providing for the determination and establishment of minimum wages for women and children, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(See resolution printed in full when presented by Mr. LODGE on the 25th instant, p. 1584, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD).

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Schenectady (N. Y.) Junior Chamber of Commerce, endorsing a proposed plan for the settlement of the war debts, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from Robert J. Siffrin, secretary, Massillon (Ohio) Trades and Labor Assembly, advising of a resolution adopted by that organization favoring the enactment of legislation to reorganize the judicial branch of the Government, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate a telegram from the general chairman for the general grievance committee of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen on the Pennsylvania lines west of Pittsburgh, Pa., in triennial session at Fort Wayne, Ind., endorsing the recommendations of the President pertaining to a reorganization of the judicial branch of the Government, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the president of the Democratic League of the District of Columbia, endorsing, on behalf of the membership of that league, certain remarks by Senator REYNOLDS before a session of that organization, namely, the program for judicial reform recommended by the President of the United States and a bill providing for restricted immigration (introduced by Mr. REYNOLDS), which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the American Society of Zoologists, favoring adequate annual appropriations for the maintenance and growth of the Army Medical Library's book collection and index catalog, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the general secretary of the International Society of Master Painters and Decorators, transmitting copies of several resolutions recently adopted by that society in convention assembled at San Antonio, Tex., which were referred to committees as indicated below:

A resolution favoring measures calculated to make the program of the Federal Housing Administration under title II of the National Housing Act more widespread and effective; and urging extension of the guaranty of principal and interest of debentures of the mutual mortgage fund issued by the Federal Housing Administration in exchange for properties foreclosed under insured mortgages; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

A resolution favoring extension of the Public Works Administration Act; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

A resolution favoring amendment of the Social Security Act providing that reports be filed quarterly instead of monthly; and

A resolution protesting against the enactment of any unemployment-insurance law exempting businesses having less than a specified number of employees, thereby discriminating against other employers who are compelled to bear a burden which will be a handicap in competitive lines; to the Committee on Finance.

A resolution expressing appreciation of the results accomplished under title I of the National Housing Act and favoring the extension of said title I; ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GIBSON presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Woodstock, Vt., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to reorganize the judicial branch of the Government, especially the proposal to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. POPE presented the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Idaho, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

We, your memorialists, the Legislature of the State of Idaho, respectfully represent:

Whereas it is very fast becoming generally realized that the availability of phosphates to plant life is a vital necessity to the maintenance of the health and vigor of the people of this Nation, through maintaining the health and vigor of our entire plant, forest, and animal life; and

Whereas it is a fact that the profit increment for our agriculture is dependent on soil fertility; and

Whereas the natural fertility of the soil throughout the Nation has been depleted to an alarming degree; and

Whereas the Federal Government is strenuously exerting its power and influence to stop this practice and to build back soil fertility through conservation, crop rotation, and application of fertilizers; and

Whereas it is evident that the element phosphorus must be returned to the soil through manual means; and

Whereas this State has 75 percent of the known high quality phosphate deposits of our Nation; and

Whereas very recent mechanical improvements and findings, as well as chemical and physical discoveries, and the inevitable increase in phosphate use, has changed the economic status of the Idaho phosphate deposits; and

Whereas western agriculture is far distant from the eastern phosphate fields, and such condition militates against cheap phosphatic fertilizer for these areas; and

Whereas Idaho's deposits are virgin and there is no present industry to revamp or eliminate; and

Whereas the industrialization of Idaho's immense phosphate beds is of national concern and importance; and

Whereas cheap electric power is a very important element in the production and processing of phosphate rock; and

Whereas the State has an immense water power potential and the other necessary affiliates at the location of said phosphate deposits as well as healthful surroundings for labor; and

Whereas Idaho is a State of extensive natural resources, and the mining of these resources and their exportation from the State, as raw materials, will gradually impoverish the State unless we can process such materials as we are eminently fitted to industrialize; and

Whereas one of the very recent chemical discoveries is of a revolutionary nature both as to processing and use of phosphates; and

Whereas this revolutionary discovery should be immediately and thoroughly exploited and commercialized; and

Whereas Idaho is preeminently fitted geographically and economically, through natural and improved facilities, to be the seat of this exploitation and commercialization by the establishment of laboratory, field, and pilot plants; and

Whereas this chemical discovery is named organo-phosphate; and

Whereas it promises to revolutionize the use of phosphates, to reduce materially their cost, to use great quantities of farm products in their compounding, and to create State economic-social stability through production and processing of her great phosphate resource: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Idaho (the house of representatives concurring), That we most respectfully urge upon our congressional delegation, Senators BORAH and POPE, and Congressmen CLARK and WHITE, early and favorable consideration of requesting an allotment to the State of Idaho of $150,000, or such allotment as is necessary, from whatever Federal source they see fit, to establish the ways and means for commercializing organo-phosphates as quickly as possible, that our Nation may have the benefit of a cheaper and more efficient fertilizer to the end of a greater social-economic security for agriculture; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the State of Idaho be authorized and he is hereby directed to immediately forward certified copies of the memorial to the Senators and the Representatives in Congress from this State.

Mr. VAN NUYS. Mr. President, I present a concurrent resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Indiana memorializing Congress to continue the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works.

The concurrent resolution was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and is as follows:

Concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to continue the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works

Whereas the Seventy-third Congress of the United States of America enacted, and the President of the United States approved, the National Industrial Recovery Act, under title II of which the United States of America, through the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works, has granted financial aid to the various States, Territories, and political subdivisions thereof in a much needed program of public improvements; and

Whereas the Congress of the United States of America has from time to time extended the said Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works and augmented the original appropriation of the Congress to further its policy of granting such financial aid for the construction of worthy public projects; and

Whereas the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works has effectively and efficiently discharged the mandate of the Congress and by such program many of the unemployed have been returned to gainful occupation, and industry generally has been greatly rehabilitated; and

Whereas the State of Indiana, its cities, towns, counties, public bodies, and political subdivisions have received financial aid from the said Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works for the construction of worthy and sorely needed public improvements, including the construction of highways, State institutional buildings, schools, city and county buildings, sewers, water and sewage treatment works, and other public improvements; and

Whereas there remains in this State a great need for the continuation of the program for public improvements of the type and character for which the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works has heretofore granted financial aid; and

Whereas the continuation of such program of public works is necessary in order that further unemployment may be reduced and absorbed by private industry; and

Whereas without financial aid of the United States of America as provided and administered through the Federal Emergency

Administration of Public Works, the continuation of such program of public improvements cannot be adequately undertaken: Therefore be it

SECTION 1. Resolved by the Senate of the General Assembly of the State of Indiana (the house of representatives concurring), That the General Assembly of the State of Indiana hereby respectfully requests the Congress of the United States to enact the necessary and appropriate laws to continue the functions of the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works and to make the necessary appropriations which will adequately provide for a continued program of public improvements.

SEC. 2. That certified copies of this resolution, properly authenticated, be transmitted forthwith to the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to each of the United States Senators and Representatives from Indiana.

Mr. GEORGE. I present a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Georgia asking for the repeal or modification of the tax on undistributed corporate earnings.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance, and it is as follows:

Whereas it has come to the attention of this body that certain provisions of the United States Revenue Act of 1936 are detrimental to the progress and industrial growth of the South and particularly to the State of Georgia and injurious to her citizens; and

Whereas the said United States Revenue Act of 1936 imposes upon all undistributed profits of corporations a tax which virtually forces the distribution of said profits; and

Whereas such distribution often weakens the financial structure of these corporations and makes it impossible for them to expand plants and replace obsolete machinery; and

Whereas small growing businesses, faced with the necessity of plant expansion and debt retirement, must pay a prohibitive cost under this tax act to maintain and improve their position; and

Whereas there should be some provisions made which will permit corporations in this class to retire indebtedness existing prior to the passage of the Revenue Act of 1936 out of their current earnings without having to pay a tax for the exercising of sound business judgment; and

Whereas the officials of several of the corporations affected by this provision of the said Revenue Act of 1936 have given assurances that their corporations will expand their enterprises in the State by extensive building programs if permitted to do so by relief from this prohibitive tax; and

Whereas numerous groups representing employers and employees have urged that these provisions of the said tax act be repealed for this benefit of people in the State; and

Whereas the Southeast is logically the place for the most rapid industrial expansion in the near future, and these provisions of the Revenue Act of 1936 are more harmful to this section of the country than to any other: Therefore be it hereby

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the General Assembly of the State of Georgia (the senate of said general assembly concurring), as follows:

1. The Senators and Representatives of the Georgia delegation in Congress be requested to support an amendment removing from the United States Revenue Act of 1936 the provision imposing the tax complained of herein.

2. The Georgia delegation in Congress be urged to exempt from this tax provision all funds of corporations used, or to be used, in expansion of industry and all funds used to pay the debts of said corporations incurred prior to January 1, 1936.

3. Copies of this resolution be furnished to each Member of the Georgia delegation in Congress.

4. A copy of this resolution be spread on the minutes of each house of the general assembly.

REORGANIZATION OF THE JUDICIARY—PETITION

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, by request, I present for appropriate reference a petition or memorial against the proposed reorganization of the Federal judiciary. I ask unanimous consent that the body of the petition may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and the body thereof was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEFEND THE HERITAGE OF JUDICIAL INDEPENDENCE

A distinguished British jurist, Herbert Arthur Smith, professor of international law at London University, warns in a special dispatch cabled under copyright by the United Press under date of February 14, that the President's proposals relating to the Supreme Court threaten "a common heritage of English-speaking people since the end of the seventeenth century."

These proposals, says Prof. Herbert Arthur Smith, "raise issues which are the common interest of all civilized countries, particularly Britain, which shares a common legal tradition with the United States and certain common conceptions in the nature of judicial independence which has been a common heritage of the English-speaking people since the end of the seventeenth century.

"This tradition has two aspects: From the judges it demands complete abstention from all political activities, whatever may have been their private opinions before being raised to the bench. For the rest of their lives they are indifferent to all and only servants and spokesmen impersonal of the law. * * * So long as the judges refrain from all political activity, it is an obligation of honor that neither their persons nor their office shall ever form a target for political bombardment.

"It is not overmuch to say that the whole structure of law and justice according to our ideas depends on the honorable observance by both sides of this unwritten convention.

"Should it be broken down, our courts would quickly become as the courts of Russia and Germany already have become the mere agents of a political party controlling the Government. * * * If a law is declared by a judge to be unacceptable to the people, as represented by a government, it is our business to change the law and leave the judge alone.

"By this we mean that we consider the principle of judicial independence one of the fundamentals of free institution and believe the maintenance of this principle is of greater importance than the decision in any particular case, however great its immediate political interest. * * *

"In Canada and Australia we have federal constitutions which are much in common with the Constitution of the United States, and it so happens that within recent weeks Canada furnished an example which may be interesting to American observers.

"During Prime Minister Bennett's recent administration the Canadian Parliament enacted a number of statutes which may be roughly described as the Canadian counterpart of the New Deal. They dealt with industrial and social problems, and they were challenged in the courts on the ground that they purported to deal with matters which under Canadian constitution are reserved to the Provinces. Three weeks ago the judicial committee of the privy council, which is the final court of appeals in such questions, decided the statutes were invalid.

"But that does not mean that those Canadians who were disappointed by the decisions will start agitation to get rid of the judges or swamp the Supreme Court with new appointments. They fully realized that in the long run they would lose much more than they could gain by any such tactics, well knowing the principle of judicial independence is of far greater importance than the enactment of any particular statute.

"A judge's business is to declare the law as he finds it laid down for him by the constitution and the legislature. Whether that law is capitalistic or socialistic, whether the principle is conservative or radical, it is equally the judge's duty to apply it as he finds it.

"If a change in the law is desirable, those changes must come from the people, acting through the appropriate legislative agencies."

ONLY THEY DESERVE LIBERTY WHO ARE WILLING TO FIGHT FOR IT

To Members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

We, the undersigned, citizens of the United States, exercising our right of petition, protest against the President's bill, or any substitutes, permitting the executive branch of the Government to control or subordinate the judicial or the legislative powers established under the Constitution.

This bill would give to the President the power to remake the Supreme Court and to pack it with men to interpret the Constitution as he wishes. Such concentration of power is dangerous even in the hands of the best-intentioned man.

The framers of the Constitution divided the Government into independent legislative, executive, and judicial departments, because history shows that concentration of those powers in one department, or in one man, inevitably leads to dictatorship.

This bill would establish such concentration of power as no one at any time in any place has been able to use for the public good. The independent branches of the Government would become the instruments of the White House. Public respect for the courts and the Congress, so essential in a democracy, would be seriously impaired.

If one President is allowed in this fashion to create a Supreme Court to interpret the Constitution so as to validate the laws he desires, neither he nor his successors will have to consult the will of the people concerning future amendments.

We therefore protest and demand that the constitutional safeguards of an independent judiciary be retained.

The power to amend our Constitution is not the Executive's, to exercise by indirection. It is not yours to surrender. It is ours, and we look to you, trustees of the people's liberties, to protect it. How you vote on this issue is all-important, now and in the future.

RETIREMENT PRIVILEGE FOR SUPREME COURT JUSTICES

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 2518) to provide for retirement of Justices of the Supreme Court, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary without amendment.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, in the consideration of House bill 2518, which is now before the Senate, I trust that this body will bear with me for a moment or two while I go back into the history of the legislation.

In 1919 Congress enacted the law which now prevails with reference to the retirement of members of the judiciary sitting in the courts of the United States, but in that law Congress provided specifically that the privilege of retirement accorded to judges of circuit courts and district courts should not be accorded to members of the Supren e Court nor to the Chief Justice of the United States. Not only did Congress not provide for such a privilege but it provided directly against such a privilege.

Following that, in 1934 or thereabouts, a measure identical with the very measure which we are now considering was offered in the other House and was rejected by that branch of the Congress. So again it was said, inferentially, to the members of the Court of last resort that they should not retire; that, regardless of their age, regardless of their infirmities, regardless of what might befall them, they could not retire under the law that gave the privilege of retirement to other members of the judiciary. That condition has continued to prevail.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield for a question; certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is the Senator prepared to state the reasons that were assigned for the discrimination as between judges of the so-called inferior courts and the Justices of the Supreme Court in that particular? Why was it that the privilege of retirement was extended to judges of the district and circuit courts and denied to Justices of the Supreme Court?

Mr. McCARRAN. Without going into it at great length, the answer to that question may be gathered from the debates on the bill which is now the law, that the discrimination grew out of a constitutional condition which was questioned at the time and which gave rise to a negative expression in the law which, while providing positive permission for the retirement of judges of the lower courts, would save the constitutional question which might arise as to Judges of the Court of last resort. That is the best answer I can give, and from the best sources which I know.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President——

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Will the Senator please state the constitutional provision to which he has reference?

Mr. McCARRAN. Stated in terms, the Constitution provides for the Supreme Court Justices and fixes the provision that they shall occupy their offices during life and good behavior. That is a constitutional provision. It is also provided that judges of inferior courts which may be created by Congress shall have their place and enjoy their office during life and good behavior; but it was deemed proper that those judges, if they saw fit, might retire and serve only in a limited capacity. That is the law as it now stands. For some reason, for which I cannot give a full explanation, it was not deemed best to give this privilege to the members of the Court of last resort.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. It was a matter of policy, was it not? It was not deemed best to give the privilege to the Supreme Court Justices?

Mr. McCARRAN. That is the way we have to read it—as a matter of policy.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. But as a matter of law the privilege could have been given without any difficulty whatsoever.

Mr. McCARRAN. That is my view, and it is the view of many other members of the committee. I expect to touch on that point in a moment.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. I still do not understand the reason for a distinction or discrimination in the law between judges of the district and circuit courts and Justices of the Supreme Court. Manifestly the duties of the latter are more arduous and more responsible than are the duties of the judges of the inferior courts. What I should like to know is the reason assigned for denying to a Justice of the Supreme Court the right to retire and compelling him, if he wished to leave the Bench, to resign, and at the same time extending to judges of courts created by the Congress the right of retirement and not requiring them to resign.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. McCARRAN. I do.

Mr. BORAH. My reading of the discussion and debate leads me to believe that it simply was not desired as a matter of legislation of that kind to deal with the Supreme Court.

Mr. ROBINSON. It was merely a matter of policy. No constitutional reason was involved.

Mr. BORAH. I find no constitutional reason, and I find no reason assigned. It was apparently desired, for certain reasons, to take care of the judges of the lower courts, and it was not desired at that time as a matter of policy to deal with the Supreme Court, not because Congress did not have the constitutional power to do so but because they did not see fit so to do.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is the impression and inference I had drawn from my limited studies of the subject matter.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. That is exactly what the Senator from Nevada stated. It was a matter of policy and not a matter of necessity or of law.

Mr. McCARRAN. That is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. This position of the Congress as to retirement by the Supreme Court Justices has now been altered at this particular time. Is that what the Senator is saying?

Mr. McCARRAN. I am trying to say that we are trying to alter it at this particular time by this bill. The passage of this bill would alter the policy so that Justices of the Supreme Court may take advantage of the same privilege that was written into the law years ago for other judges.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Is it the purpose of this bill to afford the opportunity to members of the Supreme Court to retire?

Mr. McCARRAN. It is. That is its purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. At this particular time?

Mr. McCARRAN. At any time.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Nevada that a Supreme Court Justice who would retire at this particular time would not be the sort of individual for whom I would have the greatest respect.

Mr. BONE and Mr. ROBINSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield first to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BONE. I was under the impression—and I will ask the Senator if he can give us information on the point—that at least one Justice of the Supreme Court, I believe, Mr. Justice Holmes, received a pension from the Government. Will the Senator enlighten us about that?

Mr. McCARRAN. I shall at a later moment. I yield now to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. The statement of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is an interesting one and a very peculiar one. Justices of the Supreme Court have never had the right of retirement. The Senator from California makes the amazing declaration that if the right be extended he would have no respect for a Justice who should avail himself of it.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Oh, no! That is not exactly what I said. What I said was "at this particular time."

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. When the Justices are sought to be removed in another way, if any of them should seek retirement by virtue of the bait that was held out to him, I would have very little respect for him.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is the way I understood the Senator. That is the way I intended to quote him. Then under no circumstances at this particular time could a Justice of the Supreme Court avail himself of the privilege of retirement, if it be extended, and meet the approval of the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. That is entirely correct, sir—at this particular time.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator from California be kind enough to inform me at what time he would be willing to permit a Justice of the Supreme Court to avail himself of the privilege of retirement? Does he mean at some time when another President would have the opportunity of appointing a Justice to succeed him or to serve in his place? Does he mean that he wishes to have the opportunity to appoint Justices of the Supreme Court limited to Presidents who he thinks will appoint someone that he would be ready to approve? Does he mean that he would not have the opportunity to express his disapproval of a Justice appointed by the present President under the Constitution?

The power of confirmation is vested in the Senate. The Senate can approve or disapprove of any Justice who may be appointed. Justices of the Supreme Court, however, have never had the opportunity of retirement. It is not within my limited capacity to understand, from anything that has been said here or heretofore, why the same privilege should not be accorded to the Justices of the Supreme Court that is accorded to judges of the inferior courts.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield further?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield further to the Senator from California?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have said that at this particular time I would have the feeling I have suggested. I favor this bill; not at this time, though. The Senator from Arkansas asked me when would I expect a Justice of the Supreme Court to have the right. I would expect him to have the right when there was no bait held out to him, no lure in any law that was enacted, and when he could retire without any suggestion of being driven off the bench by other legislation.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. McCARRAN. I will yield, but——

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well; I will wait.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I fear that the Senator from California in his expression is putting into this measure something that does not belong there at all. The fact of the matter is that we have denied to the Justices of the Court of last resort of this country a simple privilege or right which has been accorded to other judges. If the bill with which we are now dealing had been a law during the past 10 or 15 or 20 years, in all probability the atmosphere which the able Senator from California speaks of would not exist at all.

More than that, we are not dealing with the question of whether or not any Justice on the Court of last resort will retire. That is not a question to be considered here. The question to be considered here is whether they may have the same privilege that is accorded to other members of the judiciary on other courts. That is the simple question. It is only one of justice and fair play.

So far as the committee is concerned, so far as I am concerned, I do not know, nor do I particularly care at this time, whether any Justice may see fit to take advantage of the provision, but that it should be a part of the law of this country seems to be unanswerable in view of the fact that we have adopted that policy with reference to other members of the judiciary and carried it on from year to year.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. Perhaps I did not hear the opening part of the Senator's argument, but I desire to ask him a question. Am I correct in my understanding that at this time the Supreme Court Justices do have the right to resign upon full pay, but they do not have the retirement privilege which is accorded to the district and circuit judges?

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, the Senator is partly right and partly wrong. The fact of the matter is that no law at all is necessary to permit a man to resign. He may resign whether or not there is a law. No one can wed a man so thoroughly to an office that he may not resign.

Mr. ADAMS. My question is, If the Supreme Court Justices should exercise their right to resign at this time, whether or not they would do so with full pay.

Mr. McCARRAN. That is the question that I answer in the negative. They would not resign at full pay. The example that gives a complete answer to the Senator from Colorado is that of the resignation of Mr. Justice Holmes some years ago, as a result of which his pay was decreased, as I recall, 50 percent, and then it was subjected to a 15-percent cut during the life of the Economy Act, and to the income tax besides.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McCARRAN. I do.

Mr. BURKE. Is it not true that there is a general statute giving to Supreme Court Justices the right to resign with full pay but, because they resign instead of retiring, the pay which they would receive after resignation is subject to any cut Congress may see fit to make, as in the case of Mr. Justice Holmes, which has been mentioned? Congress passed an act fixing the maximum pension to be paid to any Federal employee at $10,000, which immediately reduced Mr. Justice Holmes' retirement pay one-half. Later, further cuts were made; but apart from action by Congress imposing some economy measure, a Justice now could resign and receive full pay for life.

Mr. McCARRAN. But the question then arises whether or not he could do so, in view of the fact that by resignation he divests himself of an office which is a constitutional office and which he holds for life.

Mr. BURKE. Subject to any action Congress might take in reducing his pay.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. If a Justice should resign, the Congress would have the power to repeal any provision of law as to his salary. A Justice who has served to an extreme old age ought not to be expected to resign from his office and take the chance of being denied any provision during the years of his life when his earning power is entirely gone.

As stated by the Senator from Nevada, the Congress has availed itself of its power very greatly to reduce the compensation of Justices who have resigned. If it saw fit, it could decline to make any provision whatever for a Justice who had resigned; and he, not being in the status of an officer, having vacated his office, would have no remedy whatever. So long as he is retired he is still in a sense a member of the Court, and his compensation cannot be reduced by law. There is a very practical difference.

Mr. BURKE. In the matter of retirement, if Congress passed a statute, a succeeding Congress could at any time repeal the statute so as to apply to the future.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not think that action could be made retroactive.

Mr. BURKE. Possibly not.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am sure it could not be made retroactive.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield to me for just one moment more?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. BURKE. The question was asked by the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] at what time a member of the Supreme Court could retire under the provisions of this measure and retain the respect of the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. I should like to answer that question specifically so far as I am concerned. At any time after the bill now pending, providing for additions to the Supreme Court, was withdrawn by its introducer, or defeated by either House of Congress, I think a Justice of the Supreme Court could retire under the provisions of this retirement measure and receive my respect, but not earlier than that.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I do not propose to permit the controversy over the bill pending in the Judiciary Committee to arise with reference to this measure. They have no connection whatever so far as I can see; and, whatever may be the views of respective Senators here as to the merit or demerit of that bill, it seems to me it should not reflect itself into the consideration of the pending bill, because the provisions of this bill have been the law for years with reference to nearly every other judge in the Federal judicial system excepting the nine Justices on the Supreme Bench.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. And, according to my recollection, the bill has been pending in the Congress for something like 2 years.

Mr. McCARRAN. The bill has been pending in Congress since 1934. It was introduced in the other House of Congress in 1934, and there was voted down. It was again introduced here; so that it is not anything new. It is not something that comes in as a bait, if you please, within the atmosphere that now surrounds this controversy.

Mr. President, if I may continue for a moment with the explanation of the bill and then yield the floor, there is not anything to be considered in connection with this bill except fair play and justice. The question may arise, as it naturally should arise, What would be the status of a Justice of the Supreme Court who might take advantage of this law if it should be enacted? The status would be that he would have retired from the Supreme Bench but would still retain his status as an inactive judge, subject to call which he himself might accept or not accept into the circuits or the other courts lower than the Supreme Court. That is the intendment of the bill. That is the purpose of the bill. The whole aim and object of the bill is to lighten the burden on those who occupy places on the Supreme Bench who have attained the age of 70, having served 10 years.

It may be within the scope of possibility that this bill, if enacted, would relieve the tension that now prevails; but, whether it would or not, the bill does not come into congressional consideration by reason of that tension, because it is not novel to Congress. It is something that has been before Congress for years, and does not come in here under the atmosphere of what we may term the President's bill.

It is no part of it. The status that would be maintained by a Justice who had retired from the Supreme Bench would be one of dignity, one of respect, one of honor, and one of service as well, because he, with his mature training and his mature experience, might serve in great capacity any one of the courts in which he might choose to serve were he called. We cast no disrespect upon him when he retires accepting the provisions of this measure. We hold him still as a judge not in active service but out of active service. By his own volition in accepting the terms of this bill he places himself in the status of a judge not in active service, and thereby maintains his right to hold his emoluments as his emoluments are now paid to him, and to hold his position subject to the call of the Chief Justice.

Mr. President, that is all I have to say in explanation of the bill at this time. I hope the bill may go through this body without amendment, in order that it may become a part of the law, as it should have been a part of the law for the past quarter of a century.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I desire to say just a word to respond to some correspondence which came into my office this morning indicating confusion about the import of this bill. The writers have seen newspaper accounts which showed that I was opposed to the bill for reorganization of the Supreme Court presented by the President and accompanied by a message. Then they saw an account that I had voted to report favorable from the Judiciary Committee this retirement bill, and wondered that I should "whiffle" about so in my judgment.

Mr. President, I wish to say to these correspondents in this manner that I do not regard it as a change at all in my attitude toward the principles involved in the two measures. I think the principles are not similar at all. I regard the pending retirement bill as a good bill. I think it ought to have been passed when it previously came before the Congress, and I am for it because I believe that it is just and fair to give Justices of the Supreme Court privileges and rights equal to those which are accorded to the other justices and judges in our Federal judicial system.

That is the reason why I am for this bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have no desire to delay action on the pending measure, and shall take only a moment to state my views in regard to it.

I agree thoroughly that we ought to have a retirement law applicable to Justices of the Supreme Court, and I agree further that the pending bill has nothing to do with other measures which are pending.

I have felt that the retirement age ought to be fixed at 75. I urged that view in the committee, but the committee was very strongly against my opinion.

I also had the feeling that the Justices of the Supreme Court, when they retire, should not be subject to call for service in the lower courts. That matter was discussed also at some length in the subcommittee, and also in the committee as a whole, but both the subcommittee and the Judiciary Committee were in favor of the pending measure.

I feel, therefore, it would be perfectly useless and a waste of time, after knowing the view of the subcommittee and the committee as a whole, to undertake to change the pending measure. However, I desire that it go into the RECORD that I feel that the retiring age should be 75 years and that the provision with reference to calling the judges to service in the lower courts should be stricken out. I feel that we should provide a dignified retirement for those who have given the best of their lives to public service and not subject them to further call to service on inferior courts. I realize that the majority of my colleagues have a different opinion. I must be content with recording my views.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, I desire to make only a brief statement as to what seems to be a necessary correction of the statement made by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] in reporting the bill and in line with the suggestion just called to the attention of the Senate by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

As I understood the Senator from Nevada, he made the statement that the bill now before the Senate extends to members of the Supreme Court identically the same provisions which for a number of years have applied to judges of the inferior Federal courts. I think that statement is not quite accurate. The law as applied to judges of the inferior courts contains the provision that they may be recalled for duty upon the same courts on which they served when on active duty. The bill before us provides, distinct from that, that any member of the Supreme Court who should retire under this provision of the law could under no circumstances be recalled for duty on the Supreme Court, but would be subject to call—true, at his own will—only in a different orbit altogether, in the lower courts. So I think there is a vital distinction between the pending bill and the existing statute. So vital did this distinction seem to me in the committee that I voted against reporting the bill with this provision in it, and if I vote for the bill at all with this provision in it, it will be with the greatest reluctance.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed, on page 1, line 3, after the word "That", to insert the words "after the expiration of 4 years from the date of the enactment of this act."

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I am in favor of the underlying principles involved in the pending bill. My understanding is that the so-called Sumners bill was introduced 2 years ago, and that for 2 years it has been before the Congress. If I had been a Member of Congress and a vote had been taken on the bill, I would have voted for it.

I am in favor of granting pensions on the basis of need and as a reward for faithful service. I think there are probably many in this country who are more needy at the present time than the gentlemen who sit upon the Supreme Court. Therefore I do not believe there is any immediate hurry for the enactment of this proposed law, or at least having it become effective at once. Nobody will suffer in the meantime, and I wonder why the sudden change of front and why the sudden hurry at this particular time.

If we are sincere in acting on this measure, I can see no harm in the proposed amendment enacting the principle of the proposed legislation that of full pay for retired Justices of the Supreme Court, but not having it take effect for 4 years, thereby taking it out of politics and out of the situation in which the Supreme Court issue is involved today.

I can picture that this measure might be used as a two-edged sword by the opponents of the Court: First, one edge in case the proposed judicial reorganization plan should not be enacted, and the second edge I can see possibly used to secure its enactment.

I believe that if we are sincere and we desire to enact the underlying principles of the measure, the proposed amendment will serve to take it out of the mire of politics and abuse to which the Court has been subjected for the last few months. I shall support the bill if my amendment is adopted, and oppose it if it is not. I hope the amendment may be agreed to.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the able Senator is one that is answered by this question: Is the Senator in favor of rendering justice now, or is he in favor of rendering justice which is now deserved at a time long in the future? Is he in favor of injecting into the matter something that will entirely deprive the Justices who may avail themselves of the privilege of retirement of the emoluments of the offices which go with their retirement, or is he in favor of injecting a political situation into the consideration of this matter?

I hope the amendment will not prevail, because, if it does, it will simply bring politics into a realm where justice and fair play alone, regardless of political lines, should prevail.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BRIDGES. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KING. It is regrettable that Congress years ago failed to make satisfactory and just provisions for the retirement of Justices of the Supreme Court. As has been stated by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], provisions were made for judges of the circuit and district courts, but suitable provisions for the members of the highest court in the land were not made. There is, therefore, much to be said in favor of a measure, belated though it may be, which would provide a fair and just retirement system for Justices of the Supreme Court. The measure before us, in my opinion, does not meet this requirement.

I am not persuaded that this measure, or any measure providing for retirement of the Justices of the Supreme Court, should be enacted at this time. It is unnecessary to consider the reasons supporting such conclusion. They are obvious to all persons familiar with recent developments in the executive and legislative branches of the Government. In my opinion, there are valid grounds for objection to the measure under consideration, and I agree in part with the statement just made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

I am aware, however, of the fact that opposition to the measure will be futile, although I believe it is not satisfactory to many Senators.

I had hoped that the Judiciary Committee would approve a number of amendments to the House bill which were considered by the subcommittee as well as by the full committee. I think the age limit should have been fixed at 75 years instead of 70 and that the provision authorizing the Chief Justice to call upon the retired Justices of the Supreme Court to perform judicial duties in judicial circuits should have been eliminated. It is believed by some that there are no sound reasons for contending that a Justice of the Supreme Court is still in office as a Supreme Court Justice when he can no longer be called upon to sit in the Supreme Court.

Senators are doubtless aware of the fact that the Chief Justice and the Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, in reply to a letter addressed to them by President George Washington, dated April 3, 1790, protested against the provision of the judiciary act requiring them to serve in the various circuits. They declared that there was a natural as well as a legal incompatibility of ultimate appellate jurisdiction, with original jurisdiction, and in effect stated that Justices of the Supreme Court may not also be judges of inferior and subordinate courts and be at the same time both the controllers and controlled. They stated that the subordinate courts were vested with original jurisdiction from which the Supreme Court was excluded, and further added that it would appear singular if the Constitution were capable of being so construed as to exclude the Court yet admit the Justices of the Court. And they further added:

> We, for our parts, consider the Constitution as plainly opposed to the appointment of the same persons to both offices, nor have we any doubts of their legal incompatibility.

President Washington, in his letter to the Chief Justice and Associate Justices, said:

> In my opinion, therefore, it is important that the judiciary system should not only be independent in its operations but as perfect as possible in its formation.

He further stated that—

> As the Justices were about to commence their first circuit that it would be agreeable to me to receive such information and remarks on this subject as you shall from time to time judge it expedient to make.

The letters referred to are important as bearing upon the question before us, and I ask that they be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, it was so ordered, and the communications are as follows:

UNITED STATES, April 3d, 1790.

GENTLEMEN: I have always been persuaded that the stability and success of the National Government, and consequently the happiness of the people of the United States would depend, in a considerable degree, on the interpretation of its laws. In my opinion, therefore, it is important that the judiciary system should not only be independent in its operations but as perfect as possible in its formation.

As you are about to commence your first circuit, and many things may occur in such an unexplored field which it would be useful should be known, I think it proper to acquaint you that it will be agreeable to me to receive such information and remarks on this subject as you shall from time to time judge it expedient to make.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

THE CHIEF JUSTICES AND ASSOCIATE JUSTICES OF THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

SIR: We, the Chief Justices and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, in pursuance of the letter which you did us the honor to write on the third of April last, take the liberty of submitting to your consideration the following remarks on the "act to establish the judicial courts of the United States."

It would doubtless have been singular if a system so new and untried, and which was necessarily formed more on principles of theory and probable expediency than former experience, had, in practice, been found entirely free from defects.

The particular and continued attention which our official duties called upon us to pay to this act has produced reflections which, at the time it was made and passed, did not probably occur in their full extent to us or others.

On comparing this act with the Constitution, we perceive deviations which, in our opinions, are important.

The first section of the third article of the Constitution declares that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish."

The second section enumerates the cases to which the judicial power shall extend. It gives to the Supreme Court original jurisdiction in only two cases, but in all the others vests it with appellate jurisdiction; and that with such exceptions, and under such regulations, as the Congress shall make.

It has long and very universally been deemed essential to the due administration of justice that some national court or council should be instituted or authorized to examine the acts of the ordinary tribunals, and ultimately to affirm or reverse their judgments and decrees, it being important that these tribunals should be confined to the limits of their respective jurisdiction, and that they should uniformly interpret and apply the law in the same sense and manner.

The appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court enables it to confine inferior courts to their proper limits, to correct their involuntary errors, and, in general, to provide that justice be administered accurately, impartially, and uniformly. These controlling powers were unavoidably great and extensive, and of such a nature as to render their being combined with other judicial powers in the same persons unadvisable.

To the natural as well as legal incompatibility of ultimate appellate jurisdiction with original jurisdiction we ascribe the exclusion, the unalterable, ever-binding decisions of this important Court would not have been secured against the influences of those predilections for individual opinions, and of those reluctances to relinquish sentiments publicly though perhaps too hastily given, which insensibly and not unfrequently infuse into the minds of the most upright men some degree of partiality for their official and public acts.

Without such exclusion no court, possessing the last resort of justice, would have acquired and preserved that public confidence which is really necessary to render the wisest institutions useful. A celebrated writer justly observes that "next to doing right, the great object in the administration of public justice should be to give public satisfaction."

Had the Constitution permitted the Supreme Court to sit in judgment and finally to decide on the acts and errors done and committed by its own members as judges of inferior and subordinate courts, much room would have been left for men on certain occasions to suspect that an unwillingness to be thought and found in the wrong had produced an improper adherence to it; or that mutual interest had generated mutual civilities and tendernesses injurious to right.

If room had been left for such suspicions, there would have been reason to apprehend that the public confidence would diminish almost in proportion to the number of cases in which the Supreme Court might affirm the acts of any of its members.

Appeals are seldom made but in doubtful cases, and in which there is at least much appearance of reason on both sides; in such cases, therefore, not only the losing party but others not immediately interested would sometimes be led to doubt whether the affirmance was entirely owing to the mere preponderance of right.

These, we presume, were among the reasons which induced the Convention to confine the Supreme Court, and consequently its judges, to appellate jurisdiction. We say "consequently its judges" because the reasons for the one apply also to the other.

We are aware of the distinction between a court and its judges; and are far from thinking it illegal or unconstitutional, however it may be inexpedient, to employ them for other purposes, provided the latter purposes be consistent and compatible with the former. But from this distinction it cannot, in our opinions, be inferred that the judges of the Supreme Court may also be judges of inferior and subordinate courts, and be at the same time both the controllers and the controlled.

The application of these remarks is obvious. The circuit courts established by the act are courts inferior and subordinate to the Supreme Court. They are vested with original jurisdiction in the cases from which the Supreme Court is excluded; and to us it would appear very singular if the Constitution was capable of being so construed as to exclude the Court but yet admit the judges of the Court. We, for our parts, consider the Constitution as plainly opposed to the appointment of the same persons to both offices; nor have we any doubts of their legal incompatibility.

Bacon, in his Abridgment, says that "offices are said to be incompatible and inconsistent, so as to be executed by one person, when, from the multiplicity of business in them, they cannot be executed with care and ability; or when their being subordinate and interfering with each other, it induces a presumption they cannot be executed with impartiality and honesty; and this, my Lord Coke says, is of that importance that if all offices, civil and ecclesiastical, &c., were only executed each by different persons, it would be for the good of the Commonwealth, and advancement of justice, and preferment of deserving men. If a forester, by patent for his life, is made justice in eyre of the same forest, hac vice, the forestership is become void, for these offices are incompatible, because the forester is under the correction of the justice in eyre and he cannot judge himself. Upon a mandamus to restore one to the place of town-clerk it was returned that he was elected mayor and sworn, and therefore they chose another town-clerk; and the court were strong of opinion that the offices were incompatible because of the subordination. A coroner made a sheriff ceases to be a coroner, so a parson made a bishop, and a judge of the common pleas made a judge of the king's bench", &c.

Other authorities on this point might be added; but the reasons on which they rest seem to us to require little elucidation or support.

There is in the act another deviation from the Constitution which we think it incumbent on us to mention.

The second section of the second article of the Constitution declares that the President shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, "shall appoint judges of the Supreme Court and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not therein otherwise provided for."

The Constitution not having otherwise provided for the appointment of the judges of the inferior courts, we conceive that the appointment of some of them, namely, of the circuit courts, by an act of the legislature is a departure from the Constitution and an exercise of powers which constitutionally and exclusively belong to the President and Senate.

We should proceed, sir, to take notice of certain defects in the act relative to expediency which we think merit the consideration of the Congress. But, as these are doubtless among the objects of the late reference made by the House of Representatives to the Attorney-General, we think it most proper to forbear making any remarks on this subject at present.

We have the honor to be, most respectfully, sir, your obedient and humble servants.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I prepared a statement which I intended as the basis of any remarks which I might submit upon the pending measure. The statement also contains an amendment which I had intended to offer, which, if adopted, would have obviated some of the objections of the bill before us.

In view of the manifest intention of the Senate to pass the bill before us, I shall not occupy any more time of the Senate in discussing the bill or the amendment which I had intended to offer. I ask, however, that the statement, together with the amendment referred to, be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The House bill (H. R. 2518) seeks to place Supreme Court Judges upon the same basis as district and circuit courts of appeal judges by permitting them to retire instead of resigning.

Under the existing law (sec. 260 of the Judicial Code, as amended by the act of Feb. 25, 1919, ch. 29, no. 6, 40 Stat. 1157, and the act of Mar. 1, 1929, ch. 419, 45 Stat. 1422) a Supreme Court Judge can resign but cannot retire, while district and circuit courts of appeal judges can both resign and retire:

"If a district or circuit judge retires, he may be called upon by the senior circuit judge of that circuit and be by him authorized to perform such judicial duties in such circuit as such retired judge may be willing to undertake, or he may be called upon by the Chief Justice and be by him authorized to perform such judicial duties in any other circuit as such retired judge may be willing to undertake, or he may be called upon either by the presiding judge or senior judge of any other such court and be by him authorized to perform such judicial duties in such court as such retired judge may be willing to undertake."

In construing this provision of law the Supreme Court held that a retired district judge or circuit court of appeals judge was still in office in the constitutional sense (Booth v. U. S., 291 U. S. 339). In this connection the Court said:

"By retiring pursuant to the statute a judge does not relinquish his office. The language is that he may retire from regular active service. The purpose is, however, that he shall continue, so far as his age and his health permit, to perform judicial service, and it is common knowledge that retired judges have, in fact, discharged a large measure of the duties which would be incumbent on them, if still in regular active service. * * *

"The act does not, and, indeed, could not, endow him with a new office, different from, but embracing, the duties of the office of judge. He does not surrender his commission but continues to act under it. He loses his seniority in office, but that fact, in itself, attests that he remains in office. A retired district judge need not be assigned to sit in his own district; and if a retired judge is called upon by the Chief Justice or a senior circuit judge to sit in another district or circuit, and he responds and serves there, his status is the same as that of any active judge, so called. It is impossible that this should be true and that at the same time the judge should hold no office under the United States." (Citations omitted.)

So the Court concluded that retired judges of the district and circuit courts of appeal were in office in the constitutional sense, and that, therefore, their salaries could not be diminished during their term of office. The effect of this decision was to make their retirement pay not subject to reduction by the Congress and also to make such retirement pay exempt from the income tax.

The House bill proposes to extend to Justices of the Supreme Court the same privilege with reference to retirement which obtains under existing law with regard to circuit and district judges. However, I do not believe it accomplishes the results intended.

Under the House bill, according to the report of the House Judiciary Committee, a Supreme Court Judge, if retired, could no longer sit in the Supreme Court by assignment or otherwise. His only duties would be that "he may be called upon by the Chief Justice and be by him authorized to perform such judicial duties, in any judicial circuit, including those of a circuit justice in such circuit, as such retired Justice may be willing to undertake."

How can it be said that a Judge of the Supreme Court is still in office as a Supreme Court Judge when he cannot longer be called upon to sit in the Supreme Court? It is true that Supreme Court Justices may now perform duties in the circuits, but they perform such acts in their individual capacity as judges by virtue of acts of Congress and not by virtue of their status as members of the Supreme Court.

In a letter from the Chief Justice and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States to President George Washington, dated April 3, 1790, the Justices protested against that provision of the Judiciary Act requiring them to serve in the various circuits and said:

"We are aware of the distinction between a court and its judges; and are far from thinking it illegal or unconstitutional, however it may be inexpedient, to employ them for other purposes, provided the latter purposes be consistent and compatible with the former. But from this distinction it cannot, in our opinions, be inferred that the judges of the Supreme Court may also be judges of inferior and subordinate courts and be at the same time both the controllers and the controlled.

"The application of these remarks is obvious. The circuit courts established by the act are courts inferior and subordinate to the Supreme Court. They are vested with original jurisdiction in the cases from which the Supreme Court is excluded; and to us it would appear very singular if the Constitution was capable of being so construed as to exclude the Court but yet admit the judges of the Court. We, for our parts, consider the Constitution as plainly opposed to the appointment of the same persons to both offices; nor have we any doubts of their legal incompatibility. * * *"

Accordingly, Supreme Court Judges performing duties in the circuits are not performing duties as Supreme Court Judges in the constitutional sense but are acting as individual judges. This is further borne out by the opinion of Mr. Justice Miller in Appleton v. Smith (1 Dillon, 202), when he was sitting as a circuit judge. In declining to hear an appeal from a district court while sitting as a circuit judge he said:

"I have repeatedly decided in this circuit since I have been assigned to it that I would not sit in review of the judgments and orders of the court made by the district judges in my absence.

"Where, as in the present case, the motion is made on the same grounds, and with no new state of pleadings or facts, it is nothing more than an appeal from one judge of the same court to another; and though it is my province in the Supreme Court to hear and determine such appeals, I have in this court no such prerogative. The district judge would have the same right to review my judgments and orders here as I would have in regard to his. It would be in the highest degree indelicate for one judge of the same court thus to review and set aside the action of his associate in his absence, and might lead to unseemly struggles to obtain a hearing before one judge in preference to the other" (Appleton v. Smith, 1 Dillon, 202).

It is therefore extremely doubtful whether Supreme Court Judges, who are only permitted to perform duties in the circuits, are "in office" as Supreme Court Justices in the constitutional sense and whether the bill will accomplish the purpose intended. In other words, it might be contended that a Supreme Court Judge performs two functions, (1) his duties as a Supreme Court Judge under the Constitution and (2) his duties to act as a judge in the circuits required of him by the Congress. Therefore his salary may be divided accordingly. The portion of his salary attributable to his functions as a circuit judge could not be reduced after he was retired under the House bill because he was still "in office" as to those duties. But the balance of his salary could be reduced after retirement because he was no longer in office as a Supreme Court Judge in the constitutional sense.

AMENDMENT TO BE OFFERED TO H. R. 2518

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"The first sentence of section 260, as amended, of the Judicial Code (U. S. C., title 28, sec. 375) is further amended to read as follows:

" 'When any judge of any court of the United States, appointed to hold his office during good behavior, resigns his office after having held a commission or commissions as judge of any such court or courts at least 10 years, continuously or otherwise, and having attained the age of 70 years, he shall, during the residue of his natural life, in consideration of his resigning his office, receieve the salary which is payable at the time of his resignation for the office that he held at the time of his resignation, which salary shall not be diminished during the period of his life.' "

Amend the title to read as follows: "An act to amend the provisions of existing law relating to resignations of judges of courts of the United States."

This proposed amendment makes it clear that Supreme Court Justices who resign are giving up a right guaranteed to them under the Constitution, the right to continue in office during good behavior and to receive a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

Those Justices who resign under this amendment acquire a vested right to receive the salary which is payable to them at the time of their resignation, and therefore their salary is fixed at the time of their resignation and cannot be diminished by any subsequent act of Congress. To diminish such salary would constitute a violation of the due-process clause of the fifth amendment. This situation seems analogous to that of Choate v. Trapp (224 U. S. 665), in which the Court held that Indian allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes acquired individually a vested right to tax exemption upon acceptance of an allotment in accordance with the terms of the Curtis Act and that such tax exemption could not be taken away without violating the due-process clause of the fifth amendment. In this connection the Court said:

"* * * Congress, in consideration of the Indians' relinquishment of all claim to the common property and for other satisfactory reasons, made a grant of land which should be nontaxable for a limited period. The patent issued in pursuance of those statutes gave the Indian as good a title to the exemption as it did to the land itself. Under the provisions of the fifth amendment there was no more power to deprive him of the exemption than of any other right in the property. No statute would have been valid which reduced his fee to a life estate or attempted to take from him 10 acres, or 50 acres, or the timber growing on the land. After he accepted the patent the Indian could not be heard, either at law or in equity, to assert any claim to the common property. If he is bound, so is the tribe and the Government when the patent was issued."

The act of May 27, 1908 (35 Stat. 313, no. 4), in taking away this exemption was held unconstitutional in this respect.

Recurring to the question before us, it might be argued that the present statute creates a vested right which the Congress could not change. But the present statute is not clear on this point, and under its language it might be contended that the amount paid to the Justice after he resigns has nothing to do with his resignation, but is a pension or gratuity granted to the Justice after he has resigned, and is not intended as an inducement to cause his resignation. This was probably the reason why the Government applied the Economy Act to the compensation received by Justice Holmes after his retirement. But the amendment changes this situation. It makes it clear that the salary paid to a Justice upon retiring is an inducement for him to resign. Therefore, a Justice resigning under the amendment and accepting its terms will have a vested right to the same compensation he was receiving at the time of his resignation, which cannot be diminished by any subsequent act of Congress.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, in reply to the last expression by the able Senator from Utah, let me say that the Justices are not to be called upon to act outside their sphere, because now they are assigned to respective circuits and serve in that capacity by law; and what they would accept after retirement would be in keeping with what they do at the present time.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am criticizing the existing law in that respect when it attempts to have Justices of the Supreme Court sit in the inferior courts. That was the point made by the Chief Justice and Associate Justices of the United States Supreme Court in answer to the letter of President George Washington, to which I have referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. McCARRAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRNES (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from California [Mr. McADOO], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. BYRD (when the name of Mr. GLASS was called). I announce that my colleague [Mr. GLASS] is detained from the Senate on account of illness. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD].

Mr. McNARY (when Mr. HALE's name was called). The senior Senator from Maine is necessarily absent. His pair has been announced. If he were present and at liberty to vote, he would vote "yea."

Mr. KING (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. I announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. DONAHEY] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] are detained on account of illness.

I further announce that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY], the Senator from California [Mr. McADOO], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] are unavoidably detained.

I further announce that the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] and the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] are absent attending the funeral of the late Representative Buchanan.

I am informed that if present and voting, the Senators mentioned would vote "yea."

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HOLT] is detained because of illness.

The result was announced—yeas 76, nays 4, as follows:

AMERICAN NEUTRALITY

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I understand it is the intention of the leaders of the Senate to request that a recess until Monday be taken; so I now desire to ask unanimous consent, prior to the taking of the recess, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 51, to amend the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution providing for the prohibition of the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent countries, and for other purposes." If consent is granted, the joint resolution will become the unfinished business; and I make the request in order that the joint resolution may be proceeded with when the Senate shall again convene.

Therefore I ask unanimous consent that Senate Joint Resolution 51 be laid before the Senate, and that the Senate proceed to its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 51. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have no objection to the request; but I want it understood that no action shall be taken on the measure, and no consideration shall be given to it until Monday next at 12 o'clock.

Mr. PITTMAN. It is not the intention of the chairman of the committee to ask that any proceeding be taken with reference to the joint resolution which would be contrary to the desires of Senators for a recess.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nevada?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 51) to amend the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution providing for the prohibition of the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent countries; the prohibition of the transportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war by vessels of the United States for the use of belligerent states; for the registration and licensing of persons engaged in the business of manufacturing, exporting, or importing arms, ammunition, or implements of war; and restricting travel by American citizens on belligerent ships during war", approved August 31, 1935, being Public Resolution No. 67, Seventy-fourth Congress (S. J. Res. 173), as amended by joint resolution approved February 29, 1936, entitled "Joint resolution extending and amending the joint resolution (Public Res. 67, 74th Cong.), approved August 31, 1935", which had been reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with an amendment to strike out all after the resolving clause and to insert:

That the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution providing for the prohibition of the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent countries; the prohibition of the transportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war by vessels of the United States for the use of belligerent states; for the registration and licensing of persons engaged in the business of manufacturing, exporting, or importing arms, ammunition, or implements of war; and restricting travel by American citizens on belligerent ships during war", approved August 31, 1935, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"That (a) whenever the President shall find that there exists a state of war between, or among, two or more foreign states, the President shall proclaim such fact, and it shall thereafter be unlawful to export arms, ammunition, or implements of war from any place in the United States, or possessions of the United States, to any such belligerent state, or to any neutral state for transshipment to, or for the use of, a belligerent state.

"(b) The President shall, from time to time, by proclamation, extend such embargo upon the export of arms, ammunition, or implements of war to other states as and when they may become involved in such war.

"(c) Whenever the President shall find that a state of civil strife exists in a foreign state and that such armed conflict is of a magnitude or is being conducted under such conditions that the export of arms, ammunition, or implements of war from the United States to said foreign state would threaten or endanger the peace of the United States, the President shall proclaim such fact, and it shall thereafter be unlawful to export arms, ammunition, or implements of war from any place in the United States, or possessions of the United States, to any such state or to any other state for transshipment to, or for use in, the state named in the proclamation.

"(d) The President, by proclamation, shall definitely enumerate the arms, ammunition, and implements of war, the export of which is prohibited by this act.

"(e) Whoever, in violation of any of the provisions of this act, shall export, or attempt to export, or cause to be exported, arms, ammunition, or implements of war from the United States, or any of its possessions, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both, and the property, vessel, or vehicle containing the same shall be subject to the provisions of sections 1 to 8, inclusive, title 6, chapter 30, of the act approved June 15, 1917 (40 Stat. 223–225; U. S. C., title 22, secs. 238–245).

"(f) In the case of the forfeiture of any arms, ammunition, or implements of war by reason of a violation of this act, no public or private sale shall be required; but such arms, ammunition, or implements of war shall be delivered to the Secretary of War for such use or disposal thereof as shall be approved by the President of the United States.

"(g) When in the judgment of the President the conditions which have caused him to issue his proclamation have ceased to exist he shall revoke the same and the provisions hereof shall thereupon cease to apply.

"(h) Except with respect to offenses committed, or forfeitures incurred prior to the revocation of the proclamation or proclamations issued thereunder, said proclamations shall become ineffective after revocation.

"SEC. 2. (a) Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation or proclamations as provided in section 1 of this act and he shall thereafter find that the placing of restrictions on the shipment of certain articles or materials in addition to arms, ammunition, and implements of war from the United States to said belligerents named in the proclamation issued under said section 1, or to a country wherein civil strife has been proclaimed to exist, is deemed necessary to promote the security or preserve the peace or neutrality of the United States or to protect the lives and commerce of nationals of the United States, he shall so proclaim and it shall thereafter be unlawful for any American vessel or aircraft to carry such articles or materials to any belligerent country, or any country wherein civil strife exists, named in said proclamation or proclamations issued under section 1 of this act, or to any other country for transshipment to, or for the use of, such belligerent countries or within such country where civil strife exists. The President shall by proclamation from time to time definitely enumerate said articles and materials which it shall be unlawful for American vessels or aircraft to transport.

"(b) It shall be unlawful to export or transport to any belligerent country, or to any country wherein civil strife exists, named in said proclamation or proclamations issued under section 1 of this act, or to any other country for transshipment to, or for the use of, such belligerent country or such country wherein civil strife exists, any articles or materials whatever until all right, title, and interest therein shall have been transferred to some foreign government, agency, institution, association, partnership, corporation, or national. The shipper of such article shall be required to file with the collector of the port from which the articles or materials are to be exported a declaration under oath that there exists in American citizens no right, title, or interest in such articles or materials, and to comply with such rules and regulations as shall be promulgated by the President. Any such declaration so filed shall be a conclusive estoppel against any claim of any American citizen of right, title, or interest in such articles or materials. Insurance written by American underwriters on any articles or materials, the exportation of which is prohibited by this act, or on articles carried by an American vessel or aircraft contrary to subsection (a) of this section shall not be deemed an American interest therein, and no insurance policy issued on such articles or materials and no loss incurred thereunder shall be made a basis of any claim put forward by the Government of the United States.

"(c) The President shall from time to time by proclamation extend such restrictions as are imposed under subsection (a) of this section to other countries as and when they may be declared to become belligerents under proclamations issued under section 1 of this act.

"(d) The President may from time to time change, modify, or revoke in whole or in part any proclamations issued by him under subsection (a) of this section.

"SEC. 3. (a) Whenever the President shall have issued his proclamation or proclamations as provided for in section 1 of this act, it shall thereafter during the period of the war or civil strife be unlawful for any person within the United States to purchase, sell, or exchange bonds, securities, or other obligations of the government of any belligerent country or country wherein civil strife exists, or of any political subdivision thereof, or of any person acting for or on behalf of such government, issued after the date of such proclamation, or to make any loan or extend any credit to any such government or person: Provided, That if the President shall find that such action will serve to protect the commercial or other interests of the United States or its nationals, he may, in his discretion, and to such extent and under such regulation as he may prescribe, except from the operation of this section ordinary commercial credits and short-time obligations in aid of legal transactions and of a character customarily used in normal peacetime commercial transactions.

"(b) The provisions of this section shall not apply to a renewal or adjustment of such indebtedness as may exist on the date of the President's proclamation.

"(c) Whoever shall violate the provisions of this section or of any regulations issued hereunder shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $50,000 or imprisoned for not more than 5 years, or both. Should the violation be by a corporation, organization, or association, each officer or agent thereof participating in the violation may be liable to the penalty herein prescribed.

"(d) When the President shall have revoked his proclamation as provided for in section 1 of this act, the provisions of this section and of any regulations issued by the President hereunder shall thereupon cease to apply.

"SEC. 4. This act shall not apply to an American republic or republics engaged in war against a non-American state or states, provided the American republic is not cooperating with a non-American state or states in such war.

"SEC. 5. (a) For the purposes of this act—

"(1) The term 'Board' means the National Munitions Control Board which is hereby established to carry out the provisions of this act. The Board shall consist of the Secretary of State, who shall be chairman and executive officer of the Board; the Secretary of the Treasury; the Secretary of War; the Secretary of the Navy; and the Secretary of Commerce. Except as otherwise provided in this act, or by other law, the administration of this act is vested in the Department of State;

"(c) Every person required to register under this section shall notify the Secretary of State of any change in the arms, ammunition, or implements of war which he exports, imports, or manufactures; and upon such notification the Secretary of State shall issue to such person an amended certificate of registration, free of charge, which shall remain valid until the date of expiration of the original certificate. Every person required to register under the provisions of this section shall pay a registration fee of $500, unless he manufactured, exported, or imported arms, ammunition, and implements of war to a total sales value of less than $50,000 during the 12 months immediately preceding his registration, in which case he shall pay a registration fee of $100. Upon receipt of the required registration fee, the Secretary of State shall issue a registration certificate valid for 5 years which shall be renewable for further periods of 5 years upon the payment for each renewal of a fee of $500 in the case of persons who manufactured, exported, or imported arms, ammunition, and implements of war to a total sales value of more than $50,000 during the 12 months immediately preceding the renewal, or a fee of $100 in the case of persons who manufactured, exported, or imported arms, ammunition, and implements of war to a total sales value of less than $50,000 during the 12 months immediately preceding the renewal. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to refund, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $400 to every person who shall have paid a registration fee of $500 pursuant to this act, who manufactured, exported, or imported arms, ammunition, and implements of war to a total sales value of less than $50,000 during the 12 months immediately preceding his registration.

"(e) All persons required to register under this section shall maintain, subject to the inspection of the Board, such permanent records of manufacture for export, importation, and exportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war as the Board shall prescribe.

"(f) Licenses shall be issued to persons who have registered as provided for, except in cases of export or import licenses where exportation of arms, ammunition, or implements of war would be in violation of this act or any other law of the United States, or of a treaty to which the United States is a party, in which cases such licenses shall not be issued.

"(g) Whenever a proclamation or proclamations are issued, as provided in section 1 of this act, all licenses theretofore issued under the act shall ipso facto, and immediately upon the issuance of such proclamation or proclamations, cease to grant authority to export arms, ammunition, or implements of war from any place in the United States, or possessions of the United States, to any port in said belligerent states or to such state wherein civil strife has been declared by Presidential proclamation to exist or to any other country for transshipment to, or for use in, any belligerent country or for use in any country where civil strife is proclaimed to exist; and said licenses, insofar as the grant of authority to export to such countries named in such proclamation or proclamations of the President is concerned, shall be null and void.

"(h) The Board shall be called by the chairman and shall hold at least one meeting a year.

"(j) The provisions of the act of August 29, 1916, relating to the sale of ordnance and stores to the Government of Cuba (39 Stat. 619, 643; U. S. C., title 50, section 72), are hereby repealed as of December 31, 1937.

"(k) The Board shall make an annual report to Congress, copies of which shall be distributed as are other reports transmitted to Congress. Such reports shall contain such information and data collected by the Board as may be considered of value in the determination of questions connected with the control of trade in arms, ammunition, and implements of war. It shall include a list of all persons required to register under the provisions of this act, and full information concerning the licenses issued hereunder.

"(l) The Secretary of State shall promulgate such rules and regulations with regard to the enforcement of this section as he may deem necessary to carry out its provisions.

"(m) The President is hereby authorized to proclaim upon recommendation of the Board from time to time a list of articles which shall be considered arms, ammunition, and implements of war for the purposes of this section.

"SEC. 6. (a) Whenever the President shall issue a proclamation provided for in section 1 of this act, thereafter it shall be unlawful for any American vessel or aircraft to carry any arms, ammunition, or implements of war to any port of the belligerent countries named in such proclamation as being at war, or to the state where civil strife is proclaimed to exist, or to any neutral port for transshipment to, or for the use of, a belligerent country, or within the state where civil strife is proclaimed to exist.

"(b) Whoever, in violation of the provisions of this section, shall take, attempt to take, or shall authorize, hire, or solicit another to take any such vessel or aircraft carrying such cargo out of port or from the jurisdiction of the United States shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both; and, in addition, such vessel or aircraft, her tackle, apparel, furniture, equipment, and the arms, ammunition, and implements of war on board shall be forfeited to the United States.

"(c) When the President finds the conditions which have caused him to issue his proclamation have ceased to exist, he shall revoke his proclamation, and the provisions of this section shall thereupon cease to apply.

"SEC. 7. Whenever, during any war in which the United States is neutral, the President, or any person thereunto authorized by him, shall have cause to believe that any vessel or aircraft, domestic or foreign, whether requiring clearance or not, is about to carry out of a port of the United States, or its possessions, men or fuel, arms, ammunition, implements of war, or other supplies to any warship, tender, or supply ship of a foreign belligerent nation, but the evidence is not deemed sufficient to justify forbidding the departure of the vessel or aircraft as provided for by section 1, title V, chapter 30, of the act approved June 15, 1917 (40 Stat. 221; U. S. C., title 18, sec. 31), and if, in the President's judgment, such action will serve to maintain peace between the United States and foreign nations, or to protect the commercial interests of the United States and its citizens, or to promote the security of the United States, he shall have the power and it shall be his duty to require the owner, master, or person in command thereof, before departing from a port of the United States, or any of its possessions, for a foreign port, to give a bond to the United States, with sufficient sureties, in such amount as he shall deem proper, conditioned that the vessel or aircraft will not deliver the men, or the cargo, or any part thereof, to any warship, tender, or supply ship of a belligerent nation; and, if the President, or any person thereunto authorized by him, shall find that a vessel or aircraft, domestic or foreign, in a port of the United States, or one of its possessions, has previously cleared from such port during such war and delivered its cargo or any part thereof to a warship, tender, or supply ship of a belligerent nation, he may prohibit the departure of such vessel or aircraft during the duration of the war.

"SEC. 8. Whenever, during any war in which the United States is neutral, the President shall find that special restrictions placed on the use of the ports and territorial waters of the United States, or of its possessions, by the submarines or armed merchant vessels of a foreign nation will serve to maintain peace between the United States and foreign nations, or to protect the commercial interests of the United States and its citizens, or to promote the security of the United States, and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall thereafter be unlawful for any such submarine or armed merchant vessels to enter a port or the territorial waters of the United States or any of its possessions, or to depart therefrom, except under such conditions and subject to such limitations as the President may prescribe. When, in his judgment, the conditions which have caused him to issue his proclamation have ceased to exist, he shall revoke his proclamation and the provisions of this section shall thereupon cease to apply.

"SEC. 9. Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation or proclamations as provided in section 1 of this act it shall be unlawful thereafter for any citizen of the United States to travel on any vessel or aircraft of the nation or nations named in the proclamation or proclamations issued pursuant to section 1 of this act, unless in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President shall prescribe: Provided, however, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to a citizen traveling on a vessel or aircraft whose voyage was begun in advance of the date of the President's proclamation, and who had no opportunity to discontinue his voyage after that date: And provided further, That they shall not apply under 90 days after the date of the President's proclamation to a citizen returning from a foreign country to the United States or to any of its possessions. When, in the President's judgment, the conditions which have caused him to issue his proclamation have ceased to exist, he shall revoke his proclamation and the provisions of this section shall thereupon cease to apply.

"SEC. 10. Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation or proclamations as provided in section 1, it shall thereafter be unlawful for any American vessel engaged in commerce with a belligerent country or a country wherein civil strife is proclaimed to exist to be armed or to carry any armament, arms, ammunition, or implements of war except small arms and ammunitions therefor and other weapons as the President may publicly designate to be in possession of the officers of such vessels deemed by the President necessary for the preservation of discipline aboard such vessels and until said proclamation or proclamations are revoked.

"SEC. 11. In every case of the violation of any of the provisions of this act where a specific penalty is not herein provided, such violator or violators, upon conviction, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both.

"SEC. 12. If any of the provisions of this act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstance, is held invalid, the remainder of the act, and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby.

"SEC. 13. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated from time to time, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such amounts as may be necessary to carry out the provisions and accomplish the purposes of this act.

"SEC. 14. The President shall promulgate such rules and regulations not inconsistent with the provisions of this act as he shall deem necessary for the administration and enforcement of the provisions of this act."

OPERATIONS OF PUBLIC CONTRACTS LAW—BIDS FOR STEEL

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I desire to address the Senate briefly in reference to a matter which recently has occupied a great deal of public attention. I refer to the agitation in the press concerning the steel companies refusing to submit bids for steel to the Government by reason of the terms of a law passed in the last session of the Congress, known as the public contracts law, sometimes referred to as the Walsh-Healey Act.

I will state the facts as I understand them. The public-contracts law was enacted for the purpose of preventing abuses growing out of the treatment of labor as the result of the general law requiring the lowest bidder for Government supplies to be given the contract. This resulted in manufacturers and producers who worked their employees the longest hours and paid the lowest wages, without regard to any minima, were receiving in many instances the Government contracts. In other words, the Government was purchasing its supplies frequently from sweatshops and other manufacturers who were taking advantage of the wide unemployment to increase hours of labor and lower the standards of working conditions.

When the N. R. A. was found to be unconstitutional by the Supreme Court we were back where we began, in the midst of the depression, with a race among some industrialists to increase hours of labor and to reduce wages. The administration therefore proposed a bill, which was enacted into law at the last session of Congress, and is known as the public contracts law. It provided that in the purchasing of supplies for the Government certain labor standards and conditions should be specified and respected by all supply contractors. Those conditions, to be set forth in all purchase contracts, were four in number: First, the provision that in the manufacture of such supplies no child labor should be employed; second, no convict labor should be employed; third, that a reasonable minimum wage should be fixed by the Department of Labor and paid; and, fourth, that the hours of labor should be 40 hours per week.

Unlike the N. R. A., the law was not passed for the purpose of regulating industries in general as to hours of employment or other labor conditions. It was enacted simply for the purpose of giving preference to the lowest bidder who maintained reasonably satisfactory working conditions when awarding contracts for Government supplies.

It was expected that this law would be usefully applied to prevent obvious exploitation of workers engaged in Government contracts. It was expected that the law would set standards giving organized labor justification for demanding the application of these standards as socially desirable and economically sound. It was not expected that the administration of the law would insist upon a rigid application of an indirect pressure when refusal to make exceptions fails of its purpose and might actually hamper the ordinary functioning of Government departments.

Let me say, in passing, that the law becomes operative only when the Government purchases supplies in excess of $10,000. The result is that only 15 percent of all the supplies purchased by the Government are subjected to the public contracts law. There will be an amendment proposed later lowering the minimum to $2,500. When the bill passed the Senate it contained such a provision, but the House changed the limitation to $10,000.

After the law was enacted and the Government asked for bids the labor conditions referred to were embodied in the request for bids. Shortly after the act first went into effect many of the major steel companies, including such corporations as Bethlehem, Jones & Laughlin, Midvale, and others, bid in full compliance with the new law and were awarded contracts on that basis.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. Is the Senator advised as to why the steel companies at first offered bids but afterward did not?

Mr. WALSH. I am coming to that.

Mr. MINTON. I thank the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. When invited to bid, as I said a moment ago, some of the largest steel companies submitted bids, but more recently they have not done so. Of 25,000,000 pounds of steel which the Government sought to have manufactured bids were received for appriximately 7,000,000 pounds.

This law did not set up entirely new labor standards. The steel companies at the time the law was enacted, and practically every other industry in the country, were on the 40-hour week, because the N. R. A. made that the standard weekly number of hours in practically all industries. The purpose of the N. R. A., you will remember, was to stretch out employment and reduce the number of unemployed. This 40-hour week was fixed by the industries themselves under the codes of the N. R. A. When this law was enacted the steel companies were on a 40-hour basis; today some of their departments are on a 40-hour weekly basis; but the large number of private contracts which they have received has led them to increase the weekly hours of their workmen to 44 hours. No one especially objects to that, and I assume in many instances it is acceptable to the employees, because thereby they have 4 extra hours of work and pay per week.

The contention of the steel companies is that to bid upon Government work under a law which restricts the hours of labor to 40 per week would be disturbing to their regular method of conducting their business. I cannot help but feel that among some members of the steel industry there is a disposition to resent the law which fixes a definite number of hours per week. Mark you, the law applies only to Government supply contracts. No one needs to bid.

I observe in the morning press a statement on behalf of the steel companies, which, in fairness to them, I will read:

NEW YORK, February 25.—United States Steel Corporation subsidiaries have entered bids for more than $2,000,000 in Government contracts under the Walsh-Healey Act, requiring specified hour and working conditions, a statement issued by the corporation today said.

The statement, intended to dispute reports the subsidiaries had refused to bid, said that on the offers entered, contracts had been awarded for $672,000 worth of material.

"In short," it continued "the Steel Corporation subsidiaries have bid on all Government contracts calling for material of their manufacture in every case where, in the opinion of the particular subsidiary involved, compliance with the stipulations of the Walsh-Healey Act would be feasible, even although such compliance would add to the cost of manufacture."

Asserting that processes involving molten steel must be operated on varying bases of hours and days, the statement said:

"Navy orders for the construction of ships comprise such a variety of products in the form of plates, shapes, bars, sheet, and strip that even a sizable order would only require the partial operation each week of the major part of the facilities of almost any plant. To introduce a different operating scale for such portion of the operations that may be involved for Navy work would completely disorganize the whole production of several plants."

That appears to state their position.

In the public contracts law there is a provision giving to the Secretary of Labor discretionary authority. I wish to read that discretionary power:

Upon a written finding by the head of the contracting agency or department—

That is, any department of the Government—that the inclusion in the proposal or contract of the representations or stipulations set forth in section 1—

That is, the section relating to child labor, minimum wages, and hours of labor per week—will seriously impair the conduct of Government business, the Secretary of Labor shall make exceptions in specific cases or otherwise when justice or public interest will be served thereby. Upon the joint recommendation of the contracting agency and the contractor, the Secretary of Labor may modify the terms of an existing contract respecting minimum rates of pay and maximum hours of labor as he may find necessary and proper in the public interest or to prevent injustice and undue hardship. The Secretary of Labor may provide reasonable limitations and may make rules and regulations allowing reasonable variations, tolerances, and exemptions to and from any or all provisions of this act respecting minimum rates of pay and maximum hours of labor or the extent of the application of this act to contractors, as hereinbefore described. * * *

I am informed that the Navy did make several written applications to the Secretary of Labor, who has the power to make exceptions, but the Secretary of Labor has taken the position that to grant an exception would establish a bad precedent. The Secretary has been unwilling up to date to make the exception in this case, and I think it is only fair to add that she appears to have good reasons for her position in view of her belief that there has been a disposition upon the part of the steel companies to resist the terms of the law. The Secretary's regulations permit overtime, but at a pay rate that the companies consider punitive, and do not want to accept. Her overtime rate is one and one-half the ordinary hourly pay rate.

I do not wish to accuse them of doing anything that is injurious to the Navy, for there is no special emergency at the present time in connection with the building of naval ships. The impasse evidently is due to the demand for 40 hours on Government contracts, and the companies' desire to finish their private contracts on specified time under a 44-hour week. Government interference with the hourly labor schedule, more than the schedule itself, I think, is resented.

Mr. President, I have purposely mentioned and discussed this feature because the press has given the impression, in stories which have emanated through that agency, that the law was generally objectionable, that it was not serving any useful purpose, that it unduly interfered with industry and it was a mistake to enact it. This is the only instance I have heard of where there has been any difficulty in the Government obtaining the necessary supplies, and in this instance, if the emergency existed, the Government could very easily waive the provisions of the present law.

Mr. President, I have risen not only for the purpose of discussing the steel aspect of the case but for the purpose of showing some of the conditions which the public contracts law and its operation has exposed and which have not, as yet, been made public.

During all this discussion about steel little or no publicity has been given to the benefits that have resulted from the enactment of this law. I submit several cases where investigations made under the Walsh-Healey Act disclosed unconscionable treatment of labor by those who have received contracts from the Government and, after being awarded the contracts, have flagrantly violated the provisions of this law.

One of the first concerns to be the subject of investigation was the King Card Overall Co., of Philadelphia, about which complaints were received on December 8. This firm has been awarded a War Department contract amounting to $21,285 for trousers, coats, and caps. The investigation disclosed that during the first week seven employees were working overtime for as much as 9 hours, and that the piece-rate system in effect at the plant was such that even experienced operators, in some cases, could make no more than 16 cents an hour.

It was discovered, furthermore, that the State workshop permit under which the company was operating had expired some time previously and had not been renewed.

Under the terms of an order of the Department of Labor, the contractor made restitution to the employees who had worked on the contract for more than the stipulated hours, and the wages required under the act were turned over to the employees as agreed. The company was also required to obtain a certificate from the State. The plant was located on an upper floor of an old building, and its employees, mostly women, seemed to be willing to work for almost nothing.

Let it be remembered that this was under a Government contract in which the terms of the law were expressed, and the contract was accepted under a willingness to comply with the labor terms.

Mr. President, in another case, in a hearing in Chicago on February 19 and 20, an examiner discovered that in the case of a company manufacturing leather gloves under a War Department contract, the amount involved being $16,500, the testimony showed that women employees of that concern were paid from $2.50 to $6 per week, and that they had been consistently requested to work 46 hours and more a week without receiving the statutory overtime pay. Two of the workers were found to be girls under the legal child age limit required by the law. The examiner found that sanitary and safety conditions in the shop were deplorable. He found the girls working at unguarded machinery; the aisles were blockaded with material, complete and incompleted work; the plumbing was in most unhealthy condition and sometimes unusable. It was all so bad the State factory inspection division has had occasion to issue several orders requiring these conditions to be corrected. After this evidence was laid before the examiner, the contractor arose and said, "Let's get this over with", and admitted his liability under the act. At the examiner's direction, the hearing was recessed and a stipulation entered causing restitution of wages to be made to the workers. The report of this case was printed extensively in one of the Chicago newspapers.

At the present time orders to appear and show cause as to why the penal provisions of the act should not be imposed are being served in five instances as a result of an inspection tour of plants which have received Government contracts subject to the act. The Department of Labor investigator discovered that out of nine plants visited, only two were complying with the law. Adjustments have already been made by two of the delinquent contractors.

Typical of the violations discovered were the following:

In the factory of the Tippett & Wood Co., at Phillipsburg, N. J., employees work 50 and 60 hours a week under the most unsanitary and unsafe conditions. The concern is making steel buoys for the Lighthouse Service. The plant, which was so cold that the inspectors had to keep their overcoats on, was heated by open fires in garbage cans and oil drums. First-aid equipment was lying open on desks exposed to dirt. Lavatories were turned off in order to prevent freezing of pipes.

In another New Jersey factory, the Woodbine Borough Clothing Co., of Woodbine, 15 girls under the child-labor limit fixed in the act, were working on a War Department contract for wool trousers. These girls and other employees, who are hired on a piece-work basis, have received no wages since January 11. The company has made advances against wages pending negotiation of a collective agreement with the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America. No time records are kept, so that it was difficult to determine the hours of employment of these children.

Weekly hours as high as 88, 97, and 99 at wages from 18 cents up are required of its employees by the Reliable Cotton Felt Co., of Hoboken. This concern is producing 500,000 pounds of cotton batting for the Procurement Division. Investigation disclosed that the plant operates on two shifts, the day shift being based on a 9-hour day and the night shift on an 11-hour period. Overtime wages totaling almost $250 were found to be due to 20 employees.

That these conditions are not confined to the garment industry has been demonstrated, not only by the investigation of the Tippett & Wood concern but also by inspection of the Union Steel Casting Co., of Pittsburgh. This contractor regularly works its employees for more than the stipulated hours. An investigator found that 11 of these men alone were owed $113.74 in overtime. In this case restitution has been made by the contractor as a result of a stipulation entered into with the Public Contracts Division.

Mr. President, if conditions like the above exist where Government contracts specify definite labor conditions, what must be conditions in so-called sweatshops that we all so vigorously condemn?

Mr. L. Metcalfe Walling, Administrator, Division of Public Contracts, Department of Labor, who furnished me with the above information, adds:

These are merely the most flagrant cases of the violations of the act which the Department has encountered. I have not summarized the cases where findings have been made excluding certain bidders from the field of Government contracts because of the bid brokerage or other technical provisions of the act. There is every reason to believe that these are not isolated instances but are typical of practices indulged in by many firms receiving Government business. Instances of this character confirm my conviction that the Government cannot afford to allow the enforcement of this new law in any way to be weakened.

Mr. President, I shall not take the time of the Senate to discuss at length the numerous other similar cases which have been called to the attention of the Department of Labor. I hope that this brief presentation may lead some of the critics of the act to reach the conclusion that the public contracts law, specifying living wages and reasonable working conditions when working upon Government supplies, is tending to improve working conditions throughout the country and is of marked benefit in the general advancement and improvement of conditions among the workers of the country. It is a fine example for the Government to set when purchasing its supplies to insist upon the lowest bidder maintaining decent working conditions for his employees.

Our Government, in fairness to employers, and there are many of them, who insist upon maintaining reasonably high standards of working conditions in their industries, cannot permit its supplies to be furnished from sweatshops and plants of other employers who have no standards, no conscience, and no respect for their employees' rights in dealings with them.

HOUSING PROJECTS—OPINION OF KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the text of the decision just rendered by the Court of Appeals of the Commonwealth of Kentucky upholding the constitutionality of the Municipal Housing Commission Act of Kentucky, providing for a program of slum clearance and housing for persons of low income. The case involved the right of the Municipal Housing Commission of the city of Louisville to undertake a slum-clearance and housing project, to condemn land therefor, and to issue its special-obligation bonds to aid in financing the construction of the project. A number of other questions relating to the slum-clearance and housing program were involved in the case and the court unanimously upheld the validity of all of the action proposed to be taken by the Housing Commission. In its decision the court recognized that slum-clearance and housing projects are for a public and governmental purpose; conseqently, it held that property may be condemned for such projects and that such projects are tax exempt as public property within the meaning of the Kentucky Constitution.

The decision is important. It is particularly significant because it involves a project to be constructed upon the same site as the one which the Federal Government attempted to acquire for a proposed Federal housing project. As we know, the attempt by the Federal Government to condemn property for its housing projects was stopped in the Federal courts when Judge Dawson held that the Federal Government lacked the power to condemn land for such purpose. The Circuit Court of Appeals of the Sixth Circuit, by a vote of 2 to 1, sustained the decision of the district court. The Supreme Court of the United States allowed certiorari, but the case was withdrawn by the Attorney General before argument or decision.

The obstacles imposed upon the housing program in Kentucky by a conservative majority in the Circuit Court of Appeals in the Sixth Circuit have now been removed by the able and enlightened decision of the Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Under this decision of the Kentucky court, housing projects may be constructed and operated by local authorities which may condemn land therefor and issue their bonds to finance their share of the construction cost.

While many of us do not agree with the decision of the Federal circuit court of appeals on this question, we must consider it in formulating a slum-clearance and housing program for the country. The decision by the Kentucky court, as well as a similar decision by the New York Court of Appeals in the case of New York City Housing Authority v. Mueller (270 N. Y. 33), indicates the manner in which housing projects may be undertaken so as to avoid the constitutional questions raised in cases where the Federal Government has attempted directly to construct and operate housing projects.

This decision of the Kentucky court is a timely one, since we are now considering a housing bill under the sponsorship of the distinguished junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]. Because of its importance and timeliness, I ask unanimous consent that the decision unanimously rendered by the Kentucky Court of Appeals may be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the opinion was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Court of Appeals of Kentucky. February 19, 1937.

Charles R. Spahn et al., appellants, v. A. J. Stewart et al., appellees. Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division

OPINION OF THE COURT BY COMMISSIONER MORRIS, AFFIRMING

The 1934 general assembly enacted chapter 133, authorizing cities of the first class to create a municipal housing commission for the purpose of improving internal conditions by carrying out a plan for the clearance of slums, and to erect and maintain low-cost houses in keeping with modern, sanitary, and safe methods.

The act and ordinance were so enacted and adopted that such cities might be entitled to the advantages of the provisions of acts of Congress extending to States and municipalities certain grants of money in furtherance of a purpose to better the standards of living.

Substantially the act provides that cities of the first class may establish an agency to investigate housing and living conditions; to plan and effectuate projects for the clearing of slum districts, furnishing, instead, reconstructed homes at reasonable rentals to persons of low incomes. The commission is authorized to sell tax-exempted bonds, not to be obligations of the city, county, or State. Power of exercising the right of eminent domain is given the commission. It was also empowered after reconstruction to rent the new habitations, applying the proceeds of such rentals to payment of interest on and for retirement of the bonds and obligations of the commission; to provide a sinking fund to be applied to upkeep, necessary improvements, and for deterioration; any surplus to go to the sinking fund of the city for the meeting of its bonded or other governmental indebtedness. Under the act the commission may be paid limited compensation for their services, either in form of a salary or per diem.

Conceiving both the act and ordinance to be invalid, appellants filed petition in the lower court seeking to perpetually enjoin the Commission from proceeding further under the ordinance mentioned. Appellant Spahn owns property within the subjected boundary; Silk, another appellant, is the owner of rentable property outside the proposed boundary. Both are taxpayers and sue not only for themselves and others owning property within and without the boundary, but for all taxpayers of the city. The relief sought was denied by the lower court, demurrer to the petition being sustained, followed by dismissal upon a declination to plead further.

The pleadings fully state jurisdictional and other facts to the extent that a case is presented. The right of appellants to institute and prosecute such a suit is not challenged. The first contention of appellant is that chapter 113 is void because in contravention of section 51 of the Constitution, which provides that no act shall relate to more than one subject, such subject to be expressed in the title, it being argued that there is nothing in the title of the act from which it might be inferred that there was to be extended the power of eminent domain, or that bonds were to be exempted from taxation. It is further asserted that the act undertakes to revise, amend, or extend existing laws without reenacting such attempted revision or extension. We shall not quote the title; it may be observed by reference to Acts of 1934, chapter 113, page 507. The substance of the act in terms has been set out above.

The title to the act in question is not vulnerable to the aimed criticism. We have time and again, in meeting such objections, held that all required by section 51 of the Constitution is that the contents of the act be so related to the title as to be clearly embraced within its terms or, as it is sometimes expressed, germane (Kelly v. Hardwick, 228 Ky. 349; 14 S. W. (2) 1098). The section of the Constitution, supra, does not demand, nor is it intended thereby, that the title embrace a complete synopsis of the provisions of the act, nor that it set out details minutely. The title "need only indicate the general contents (purpose) and scope of the act, and, if it gives reasonable notice thereof, it is sufficient" (Russell v. Logan County Board of Education, 247 Ky. 703; 57 S. W. (2) 681). The title of the act in question may be laid down by the side of the title of the act which was attacked on like grounds in Estes v. Highway Commission (235 Ky. 86; 20 S. W. (2) 538), and the similarity (both of title and act) will be noted. In that case we held the title commensurate. The same may be said of Klein v. City of Louisville (224 Ky. 624; 6 S. W. (2) 1104). Reference is especially made to this court's opinion in the case of Talbott v. Lafoon (257 Ky. 773; 79 S. W. (2) 244) for a comprehensive exposition of the subject under discussion.

It is true that chapter 113, supra, comprises a diversity of details necessary to carry out its purpose and intent. These details do not differ materially from such as were contained in the acts involved in the cases mentioned above, the Estes and Klein cases, as being exemplary. The title here is amply broad in its scope to meet the requirements imposed by section 51 of the Constitution.

Neither does the act extend, revise, nor amend any existing law. At the time of its passage there was no law in our statutes in reference to slum clearance or cheaper housing. It is true we had laws, both constitutional and statutory, with relation to the power to condemn property for public use, and the exemption of property from taxation, but the act in question did not undertake to, nor did it amend, revise, or repeal any of these laws (Kirby v. Bowling Green, 220 Ky. 829, 295 S. W. 1004; Williams v. Raceland, 245 Ky. 212, 53 S. W. (2) 370; Wheeler v. Hopkinsville, 245 Ky. 388, 53 S. W. (2) 740).

Appellants contend that chapter 113, Acts of 1934, is void, since it delegates legislative powers. In that the commission is vested with power to determine the type, nature, character, and extent of the projects to be undertaken under the ordinance, as well as to determine what properties may be acquired, the manner of acquirement and use, and to later control that use.

The two objections may be considered together, and likewise answered. The act as we view it, does not delegate to the mayor of a city of the first class any legislative power. He is only given the power of appointment. This is not in any sense the exercise of more than an usual and ordinary executive power, such as filling by appointment any office created in a lawful method. Neither do we find that the commission is vested with legislative power. We need not again enumerate its functions.

The conclusion that there is no delegation of legislative power may well be based on the opinion in Estes v. State Highway Commission, supra, wherein the court held valid the toll bridge act, vesting powers in the highway commission to fix rates of toll, issue bonds, fix their maturities, and terms on which bids should be made and contracts accepted. The Court held that no sections of the Constitution were violated by the act, the power vested being purely administrative. This case cited with approval Hunter v. Louisville (204 Ky. 562, 265 S. W. 277), which held valid an act creating a commission to construct a memorial building in Louisville; to make and enforce rules and regulations in the management of its affairs, and to conduct its business. Klein v. Louisville et al. (224 Ky. 624, 68 S. W. (2) 1104) upheld an act authorizing the building of the municipal bridge, giving a commission power to fix tolls, regulate rates, issue and retire bonds. Craig v. O'Rear (199 Ky. 533, 251 S. W. 828) delegated powers to certain agencies to select locations for teachers' colleges; other powers were delegated and in this and all the cases cited the Court held that the acts were valid, since not delegating powers other than administrative, hence not contravening the sections of the Constitution there and here invoked. Counsel for appellant has pointed to no authority from this or any other court which would militate against our conclusion that the point made is unmeritorious. Other cases in this jurisdiction may be noted, as follows: Bell's Com. v. Board of Education of Harrodsburg (192 Ky. 700, 234 S. W. 311), Douglas Park Jockey Club v. Talbott (173 Ky. 685, 191 S. W. 474), Lawrence Co. v. Fiscal Court (191 Ky. 45, 229 S. W. 139).

There are other objections urged as being sufficient to justify us in holding the act invalid. As we observe (and shall treat) them jointly and severally it occurs that each and all inevitably turn upon the question as to whether or not the ultimate result sought constitutes a public use or purpose. A determination of this question will to all intents and purposes dispose of most, if not all, of the objections forwarded, some of which are as follows:

(a) The act and ordinance are both invalid, because if carried into effect the appellants and those for whom they speak will be deprived of their properties without due process of law, in contravention of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States and the Bill of Rights as set up in our Constitution.

(b) The condemnation of property as proposed under the empowering acts cannot be legally effectuated because the purpose and intended use is not "governmental."

(c) It is special or class legislation, for the benefit of one class of citizens to the exclusion of all others.

(d) Neither the general assembly by its act nor the city by its ordinance possess the power to exempt from taxation the bonds issued by the Housing Commission to raise funds to carry out the project, because the purpose is not "governmental" (Kentucky Constitution, secs. 171 and 174).

A public purpose has for its objective the promotion of public health, safety, morals, general welfare, security, prosperity, and contentment of the State or a political subdivision, * * * the powers of which are exercised to promote such purposes (Green v. Frazier, 176 N. W. 11, 44 N. D. 375, affirmed in the United States Supreme Court, see infra; see also Carmon v. Hickman Co., 185 Ky. 630, 215 S. W. 840; Barker v. Crum, 190 Ky. 480, 227 S. W. 1016; Nourse v. City of Russellville, 257 Ky. 525, 78 S. W. (2) 525).

The word "slum", harsh and objectionable to the aesthetic ear, has come to have a well-defined meaning, applicable to sections of almost every city or town of proportions. It is usually taken to mean "a squalid, dirty street or quarter of a city, town, or village, ordinarily inhabited by the very poor, destitute, or criminal classes; overcrowding is usually a prevailing characteristic. The word is comparatively recent and is of uncertain origin. It has been doubtfully connected with a dialectal use of the word 'slump' in the sense of a swampy, marshy place." (Encyclopedia Britannica 25, 246.) Brewer, Phrase and Fable, says, "Slums are purieus of Westminster Abbey where the derelict may obtain a night's lodging for a few pence." Although the word may be of comparatively recent origin, the matter of properly housing persons living in unclean, unsanitary houses in congested portions of cities has been a subject of public concern for many years. The importance of proper housing had received public recognition in England for more than 100 years; in 1909 it had reached considerable proportions. The motive was first purely philanthropic, and the objective was to improve the condition of the working classes. As early as 1841 there existed at least two societies, one the Metropolitan Association for Improving the Dwellings of the Industrial Classes. The two societies, after successfully operating for a time found that from better housing the moral improvement was almost "equal to the physical benefit." Legislation looking to the same end soon followed, and has at intervals continued to the present time. (Encyclopedia Britannica, vol. 13, p. 815.) The requirements of public health are indeterminate and interminable; as knowledge increases standards of living, of health, and of safety constantly rise. It is the changing standard which gives most concern; housing at one period thought eminently satisfactory is presently condemned. In the present age, as in the past, material conditions of environment take a leading position. These truths are recognized just as strongly in this as in other countries which have outstripped ours in looking to the welfare of those whose conditions of life might be bettered by a more healthful surrounding. (Encyclopedia Britannica, under title "Housing.")

In 1933, under a survey of the city of Louisville, including the territory selected for the purposes here, conditions existed worthy of consideration and action. The number of tubercular patients in the selected area bore the average proportions of 1 to 187 inhabitants, whereas the ratio in the whole city was 1 to 463. The ratio of major crimes committed in the spotted area was 1 to 63, while in the total area it was 1 to every 171, and in minor derelictions 1 to 82; and 1 to 129 juvenile delinquencies, 1 to 50 as against 1 to 182.

It takes little argument, if such conditions as are described exist, and no doubt they do, to convince one that there is existent a condition which cannot (and has not) been ameliorated in the past by those who own and control the properties, though aided by such safety and welfare measures as have been thus far adopted, and to some extent carried into effect by State and municipal governments. The situation calls for action in some way that may prove more efficacious.

The general assembly, in empowering the city to undertake the clearance plan, declared the purpose to be "Objects essential to public interest." Its conclusions are not at all binding, but they may be given considerable effect. They may be looked upon as being persuasive (New York City Housing Authority v. Muller, 105 A. L. R. 905, 1 N. E. (2) 153, 270 N. Y. 333). The opinions of legislative bodies are entitled to respect (Black v. Hirsch, 256 U. S. 135, 65 L. Ed. 865; People v. Charles Schweinter, 214 N. Y. 395, L. R. A. 1918 A, 1124).

The necessity, expediency and propriety of enacting measures looking to the end here hoped for, are of general interest, the policy vested solely in legislative bodies. "The motives that influence the action will not be inquired into, except in rare cases where it is manifest that a flagrant wrong has been perpetrated upon the public" (Henderson v. City of Lexington, 132 Ky. 390, 111 S. W. 318; First National Bank of Paducah, 202 Ky. 48, 258 S. W. 938; L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Louisville (2 cases), 131 Ky. 108, 114 S. W. 743; 190 Ky. 214, 227 S. W. 160).

The question of the necessity for the exercise of eminent domain is one primarily and almost exclusively, addressed to the legislative branch, while the question of whether or not the use to which the proposed condemned property be put is a public use or purpose, is one to be determined by the judiciary (Tracy v. Elizabethtown & C. R. R., 80 Ky. 259; Henderson v. City of Lexington, supra; Bank v. Paducah, supra). In carrying out that part of the administration of government, this court has not infrequently been called upon to determine the question of use, and has held that the power to condemn was rightfully conferred in many cases where the purpose was not as far reaching or as beneficial as it may prove to be here. A tramway, Chesapeake Stone Co. v. Moreland (126 Ky. 656, 104 S. W. 76); a pipe line, Paine's Guardian v. Calor & Gas Co. (31 Ky. L. R. 754, 10 S. W. 309); railroad rights-of-way, Riley v. Louisville H. & St. L. Ry. Co. (142 Ky. 67, 133 S. W. 871); drainage ditches, Carter v. Griffith (179 Ky. 194, 200 S. W. 369).

In some of the earlier cases; e. g., Stone Co. v. Moreland, supra, a narrow view of the words "public use" was expressed. This view was somewhat extended in Carter v. Griffiths, supra, which was an undertaking by condemnation to take private property for the use of constructing a drainage canal. The Court therein indicated a benefit to public health was not the sole purpose for which property might be acquired by condemnation for ditch purposes, but that the reclamation of low and swampy lands for agricultural and other economic purposes brought the exercised power within the scope of governmental functions.

In this case, quoting from Wilson v. Compton Bond Co. (103 Ark. 452; 146 S. W. 110), we said:

"Nor is it necessary that the entire State should directly enjoy or participate in an improvement of this nature in order to constitute it a public use within the meaning of the words as used in our constitution or the Federal Constitution, providing that property shall not be taken without consent of the owner except for a public use. In the broad and incomprehensive view that has been taken of the rights growing out of these constitutional provisions, everything which tends to enlarge the resources and promote the productive power of any considerable number of the inhabitants of a section of the State contributes, either directly or indirectly, to the general welfare and the prosperity of the whole community, and, therefore, to the public."

In L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Louisville (131 Ky. 108; 114 S. W. 743), we said:

"It is probable that in every case where the right of eminent domain is exercised, private interests will be more or less benefited, but the existence of this fact will not be allowed to defeat the benefits that will accrue to the public."

In Rindge Co. v. Los Angeles (262 U. S. 700, 43 S. Ct. 689; 67 L. Ed. 1186), condemnation of land for a road which appeared to serve no public purpose insofar as reaching one point from another was concerned, was upheld because "a road need not be for the purpose of business to create a public exigency; aid, exercise, and recreation are important to the general health and welfare; pleasure travel may be accommodated as well as business travel, and highways may be condemned to places of pleasing natural scenery." See Cooley Const. Lim., 8th ed., vol. 2, p. 1131; Strickley v. Highland Boy Gold Mining Co. (200 U. S. 527); Green v. Frazier (253 U. S. 233, 40 S. Ct. 449; 64 L. Ed. 878); Black v. Hirsch, supra; Marcus Brown Co. v. Feldman (256 U. S.); Green v. Frazier, supra, is of fitting application here; it had to do with a home building act. The contention was that the act was contrary to both the State and Federal Constitutions. The Supreme Court upheld the favorable decision of the North Dakota Supreme Court. See also Willom v. Powell (91 Cal. App. 1, 266 Pac. 1029); Village of Euclid v. Ambler Realty Co. (272 U. S. 365); Tenement House Department v. Maescher (179 N. Y. 325); N. Y. v. Rector (125 N. Y. 32); Adler v. Dergan (251 N. Y. 467), in which Justice Cardozo, concurring, said:

"The multiple dwelling act is aimed at many evils, but most of all it is a measure to eradicate the slums. It seeks to bring about conditions whereby healthy children shall be born and healthy men and women be reared. * * * The end to be achieved is more the avoidance of pestilence or contagion. If the moral and physical fiber of its manhood and its womanhood is not a State concern, the question is, What is? Till now the voice of the courts has not faltered for an answer."

The use here proposed, as argued by appellee and admitted by appellants, may be more beneficial in the way of direct aid to a particular class, but it also operates to the benefit of the general public and its welfare. The act limits the ultimate use of the improved property to such persons as may be selected to occupy. This does not brand the purpose class or special legislation. Whether or not the persons chosen to occupy are to be ultimately benefited more than those who are not, is a socialogical question because of differing circumstances. Who can say that in the long run those who live in sumptuous residences environed by the elite may not account themselves still more blessed if by improved conditions of housing in another section they are relieved from the probabilities or possibilities of an epidemic of smallpox, typhoid fever, or other diseases, or that they may sleep more serenely because of a lessened fear of the commission of crime against their persons or property? "The essential purpose of the legislation is not to benefit that class or any class; it is to protect and safeguard the entire public from the menace of the slums" (Housing Authority v. Muller, supra). The fact that all individuals may not be elected to occupy the reconditioned premises is not material. A power plant, because of limited equipment, may not be able at all times to serve all the public, but it is none the less rendering public service. It is not essential to the validity of the proposal that all the public reap like direct benefits (Ridge v. Los Angeles, supra; Fallbrook Irrigation Dist. v. Bardley, 164 U. S. 112). The fact that those who may ultimately occupy the premises may have a preference is immaterial (Long Island Water Sup. Co. v. Brooklyn, 166 U. S. 687). Nor is it material that some reap more benefit than others (Strickley v. Highland Boy Mining Co., supra; Mt. Vernon Cotton Duck Co. v. Alabama I. P. Co., 240 U. S. 30). Nor is the Government competing with private enterprise (Green v. Frazier, supra; Modern Water Works Co. v. Modera, 228 U. S. 464; Knoxville Water Co. v. Knoxville, 200 U. S. 22; Springfield Gas Co. v. Springfield, 257 U. S. 66).

The bonds proposed are to be issued to retire 55 percent of the total cost of the project. These bonds do not obligate the State, the county of Jefferson, nor the city of Louisville. They are payable, maturities and interest, from the revenues to be acquired from the rentals of the rehabilitated properties, secured by a first and prior lien on the properties. The plan of meeting the obligations in no material sense differs from plans which have heretofore been approved with regard to the building of interstate and intrastate toll bridges, financing certain educational institutions, in the expanding and improvement of their properties, or Waverley Sanitarium in providing more adequate facilities for caring for tubercular patients, all under acts not dissimilar to the one in question. (See Hughes v. State Board of Health, 260 Ky. 228, 84 S. W. (2) 52; Williams v. Raceland, 245 Ky. 388, 53 S. W. (2) 740; Estes v. Highway Commission, supra; Bloxton v. Highway Commission; Klein v. Louisville; J. D. Van Hooser v. University of Kentucky, supra.

On both the dominant contentions here urged we are much persuaded by the able opinion of Justice Crouch, of the New York Court of Appeals, in New York City Housing Authority v. Andrew Muller et al., supra. The act there questioned was similar to the act here attacked. Only two contentions were urged, or, at least, considered by the Court, and these two are common to the case here, i. e., power to condemn and exemption of the bonds from taxation, both there as here, bringing up the question as to whether the intended use of the property was of such public nature as to permit the condemnation and exemption in face of a similar State constitutional prohibition and the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. We quote:

"Slum areas are the breeding places of disease which may take toll not only from the denizens but from the inhabitants of the entire city and State. Juvenile delinquency and crime and immorality are born there, find protection, and flourish. Enormous economic losses result directly from the unnecessary expenditure of public funds to maintain health and hospital services for afflicted slum dwellers and to war against crime and immorality. * * * Concededly these are matters of public concern (Adler v. Deegan, 251 N. Y. 477; 167 N. E. 175). Time and again in familiar cases needing no citation the use by the legislature of the power of taxation and of the police power in dealing with the evils of the slums have been upheld. Now, in continuation of a battle which, if not entirely lost, is far from won, the legislature has resorted to the last of the trinity of the sovereign power by giving to a city agency the power of eminent domain."

Quoting from Matter of Ryers (72 N. Y. 1; 28 Am. Rep. 88), the New York court said:

"To take for the promotion of the public health is a public purpose. Over many years and in a multitude of cases the courts have vainly attempted to define comprehensively the concept of a public use and to formulate a universal test. They have found here, as elsewhere, that to formulate anything ultimate, even though it were possible, would in an inevitably changing world be unwise, if not futile. Lacking a controlling precedent, we deal with the question as it presents itself on the facts at the present point of time. * * * It is also said that since the taking to provide apartments to be rented to a class designated as persons of 'low income' or to be leased or sold to limited dividend corporations the use is private and not public. This objection disregards the primary purpose of the legislation. Use of a proposed structure facility or service by everybody and anybody is one of the abandoned universal tests of public use (Mt. Vernon Woodbery Cotton Duck Co. v. Alabama, I. P. Co.; Highland Boy Mining Co.; Rindge v. Los Angeles County; Fallbrook Irrigation Dist. v. Bradley", all supra).

In commenting on the New York case (105 A. L. R.), we do not overlook U. S. v. Certain Lands (78 Fed. (2) 684) or U. S. v. Certain Lands (12 Fed. Sup. 345, and 9 Fed. Sup. 684), in which the circuit courts of appeals held that the Federal Government could not enter a State and condemn lands for housing purposes, because "the State and Federal Governments are distinct sovereignties, and what is a public use under one may not be a public use in another." In short, the court, apparently of the opinion that the use was for public purposes, held that the Federal Government could not condemn private property except for purely Federal governmental purposes. The Attorney General of the United States recognized the propriety of these opinions, since certiorari in each was dismissed on his motion in the United States Supreme Court. The objectionable feature was abandoned by a more recent act of Congress (U. S. C. A, title 40–421).

From what we have above said it is discernible that the property intended to be acquired here by condemnation, if such become necessary, is to be used for a public purpose. It follows that such condemnation, if undertaken, will not violate either the fourteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution nor any section of our own. This conclusion, we think, should dispose of the contention that the bonds issued in furtherance of the property cannot be exempted from taxation. If the purpose is public, they are in express terms exempted by provisions of our Constitution. We have had this question in perhaps other forms before us not infrequently. We have consistently held that where the bonds are to be issued in furtherance of a public purpose, the evidence of debt stands in the same light as other public property. Some of the cases where the contention of appellant has been adversely determined may be noted (Com. v. Covington, 128 Ky. 36, 107 S. W. 231; Com. v. Newport, 32 R. 820, 107 S. W. 232; Covington v. Dist. Highlands, 33 R. 323, 110 S. W. 338; Dist. of Highlands v. Covington, 164 Ky. 815, 176 S. W. 192; Harlan v. Blair, 251 Ky. 51, 64 S. W. (2) 434; Estes v. Highway Com., Bloxton v. Same; Klein v. Louisville, all supra). These cases and those added below dispose of the contention that since the housing commission is merely an agency of the city, the bonds are obligations of the city, this notwithstanding the act and resolution distinctly provide otherwise (Board of Education v. City, 108 Ky. 209, 56 S. W. 109; Board of Education of Bowling Green v. Townsend, 140 Ky. 248, 130 S. W. 1105; Klein v. City of Louisville and Hunter v. City, both supra.)

It is contended that the act and ordinance are invalid because in such contracts as the housing commission may make certain prescribed wages for labor are to be paid and laborers to be limited to so many working hours. This provision in the act is there placed because it is a condition upon which the grant of the 45 percent of the entire cost of the project is proffered by the United States Government. It is said that the act, ordinance, rules, and regulations violate such parts of the charter of cities of the first class requiring all contracts to be let under competitive bidding to the lowest and best bidder. There is no merit in this contention. No matter what the charter of the city provided with regard to general contracts for public works or for any governmental expenditures under contract, the council had the right to ordain that in case they were to receive a donation for the purpose on condition that the award of contracts should be limited to those who would agree to comply with its prerequisites as to hours of labor and scale of wages.

We have heretofore approved contracts let where there were similar grants by the Government. Much work has been done under them. As examples we might cite Clay v. Board of Regents, Morehead College (255 Ky. 846; 75 S. W. (2) 550); Davis v. Board of Education, Newport (260 Ky. 249; 83 S. W. (2) 34);

J. D. VanHooser v. University, supra; Hughes v. State Board of Health (260 Ky. 288; 84 S. W. (2) 54), and perhaps others. Cases in other jurisdictions in point are Atkins v. Kansas (191 U. S. 207); Jahn v. Seattle (207 Pac. 667); People v. Orange Co. Road Construction Co. (68 N. E. 129). These deal with hours of labor. Dealing with wage scales may be noted Jahn v. Seattle; Malette v. Spokane (137 Pac. 496); Interstate Power Co. v. Cushing (12 Fed. Supp. (806) Okla.); Iowa Southern Utilities Co. v. Laomi (11 Fed. Supp., 581 (Iowa)). In Heim. v. McCall (239 U. S. 175); Cornelius v. Settle (213 Pac. 17) it was held not in violation of constitution or statute for a city or State to give preferential employment to citizens of the State engaging in public construction.

Lastly, appellant contends that because of the limitation of '4 of the act of 1934, and generally the Commission is limited to expenditures of money, proceeds of the operation of the project hence cannot at the expense of the city proceed with plans, including the making of surveys. From a reading of the act we find that it is provided that the Commission shall be paid small stipends and by ordinance expenses in carrying out preliminaries. The act could not nor does it appropriate the city's money. The ordinance does appropriate limited compensation and expenses. As we read the act the Commission may not incur any obligations beyond the extent of moneys on hand arising from operation. We express the opinion that since the legislative body of the city is given the power to create the agency herein created and appoint the agents to carry out a public purpose it would follow that it had the power to provide compensaion as well as to provide for functioning expenses. To hold otherwise would be to render the act impotent, and even should we hold otherwise the act in other respects would not be vitiated.

From a careful survey of the record, we are of the opinion that neither the act, ordinance of the city, nor the rules and regulations of the Commission transcend any fundamental laws, any statute, or ordinance of first-class cities, hence we conclude that the court below properly sustained the demurrer to and dismissed appellants' petition.

Affirmed: The whole court sitting.

PROPAGANDA AGAINST PROPOSED REORGANIZATION OF FEDERAL JUDICIARY

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, out of order, I ask leave to address the Senate for a few minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Arkansas will proceed.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, some days ago the attention of the Senate was called to propagandist efforts that are being made to misinform the country touching the President's proposal for the reorganization of the Federal courts. When I made that suggestion there was no definite proof available for my use to support the conclusion then stated. The evidence was at that time circumstantial rather than direct and express. One could observe what was taking place in many newspapers and other publications and could realize that there was some concert of effort touching the subject matter of court reorganization. In this country we have absolute freedom of speech and freedom of the press, and I trust that, through all the years while our Republic exists, this condition will continue to prevail. Those who avail themselves of the privileges guaranteed by our Constitution, of the rights, if you please, secured by that great instrument owe some duty to themselves and to the country.

I am prompted by a species of propagandism relating to the subject of the reorganization of the Court as recommended by the President to call the attention of the Senate to what I believe to be an untruthful, unfair, and deliberately dishonorable effort to influence public opinion on this question.

Let me say at once that there is ground for controversy. Those who do not believe in the program and reforms which have been brought forward during the administration of President Roosevelt have the right to oppose them, to express their views in every practicable way, to present their arguments—just as much right as has anyone who does believe in them and who advocates them.

As an illustration of what is going on I point to a message which I received this morning and which has probably been received by every other Member of this body and by every Member of the House of Representatives. In an envelope bearing the return address of Theo. Mahn, Alma, Nebr., under date of February 25, are contained representations and suggestions which show a deliberate and organized effort to mislead those who are charged with the responsibility of determining the issues involved in the proposed legislation relating to reorganization of the Federal judiciary.

The letter comes in an envelope marked, as has been stated already, but is addressed from Wichita, Kans. It is entitled "The Crisis Hour Is Here" and reads as follows:

WICHITA, KANS., February 12, 1937.

DEAR CHRISTIAN FRIEND: You have been reading in the newspapers about Mr. Roosevelt's shocking demand that he be allowed to "pack" the United States Supreme Court with radicals who would serve as his personal puppets.

This is the most ominous development toward the dictatorship—

"Dictatorship" being in capitals—ever to occur in the history of our country. According to the consensus of best opinion it means one thing: Franklin Roosevelt wants—to be an absolute dictator—

"Wants" is in capitals—

"Dictator" again in capitals—of the United States. Therefore, press dispatches from both Moscow and Rome (the seats of communism and fascism) are praising his attempt to render the Supreme Court impotent. Both Communists and Fascists know that, if he succeeds, constitutional government will be destroyed in the United States and personal liberties will be abolished.

The Defender Magazine has the largest and most select group of Protestant readers in the United States. It is, therefore, natural that we should express ourselves in unison during the present crisis. In fact, there are indications that God has brought us together for just such a specific work at this particular time.

Mr. Roosevelt virtually controls both the Congress and Senate. If he succeeds in usurping the powers of the Court, the Constitution will become a dead letter.

Then in capitals:

In other words, the end of Christian Americanism is today in sight!

That is the end of the capitals. Continuing in quotation:

May the God of our fathers come to our rescue. I plead with you to make this a subject of daily prayer. Pray for a Nation-wide awakening. Many people are stupefied. They can't seem to realize what is going on about them. Pray that they awaken before it is too late!

Robert A. Taft, son of the former President, speaks correctly when he says, "Mr. Roosevelt's plan is an attempt to secure personal control of the entire Government." A noted southern leader says, "If this bill is passed, it will give Roosevelt more power than Mussolini * * *."

Enclosed find six blanks entitled "Hands Off the Supreme Court!" Sign three of them. Mail two of them quick—to the two Senators from your State and rush the third to the Congressman from your district.

"Quick" is in capitals—

Give the remaining three blanks to some friend or relative in your neighborhood and have them do the same thing. If everyone to whom I am sending this letter will act on this suggestion immediately—

"Immediately" is in capitals—one-half million—500,000—of these signed statements will pour in upon Washington within the next few days. Such a tremendous impact will not be ignored!

"Not" is in capitals.

Truly "in union there is strength."

And when you mail your blanks be sure to back them up with prayer.

Yours in Christ,

GERALD B. WINROD.

It sounds like one of the old appeals from the Ku Klux Klan of years gone by. It is a deliberate effort to influence unfairly the minds of Senators and Representatives and to distort public opinion concerning the question at issue.

That is not all of this propagandist's effort. There are several slips, some of them yellow—appropriately colored—some of them pink, some of them green; and the language on these slips, in capital letters, at the top of the slip, is "Hands Off the Supreme Court."

The slip reads:

DEAR SIR: Believing that the proposals to revise and weaken the United States Supreme Court would prepare the way for dictatorship in our country, I earnestly urge you to use your influence against the measure.

The word "against" is in capitals. Then follows a blank for signature.

Accompanying the slips and the circular letter which I have read is a memorandum, as follows:

The names of the two Senators from Nebraska are Hon. G. W. NORRIS and Hon. E. R. BURKE. Address them in care of the Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Now, I may say to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] we have found out who he is and where he is from. [Laughter.]

The names of the Congressmen from Nebraska are HENRY C. LUCKEY, C. F. MCLAUGHLIN, K. STEFAN, C. G. BINDERUP, and H. B. COFFEE. The Congressmen should be addressed in care of the House Building, Washington, D. C.

This is the conclusion of the propaganda to which I am now referring. It shows a deliberate effort to prejudice the minds of the American people and to put pressure on the Members of the Congress to induce them to respond to a stimulated and false public opinion.

I do not intend at this time to enter into an argument on the questions involved in the proposed legislation. My sole purpose is to show that the fight against the proposed legislation is not being honestly or fairly conducted. The "brother in Christ" who wrote that article is, in my opinion, neither honest nor fair, and he is not a brother in anything worth recognizing in this country.

Of course, he has the right to oppose the reorganization of the courts. Of course, he has the right to make any argument that addresses itself to his mind as forceful or fair in connection with the subject, but if there is anyone here who believes that that argument is a fair argument, I should like to have him interrupt me now to say so.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. BURKE. Does the Senator from Arkansas mean to intimate by reading this letter that he thinks either the senior Senator from Nebraska or the junior Senator from Nebraska would be influenced in any respect by the letter?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I do not intimate anything. I say what I have to say, and what I assert is that an unfair and dishonest effort is being made to influence Senators and Representatives. I do not, of course, know what effect it will have on the mind of the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE]. I think I know something of what effect it will have on the mind of the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. BURKE. If the Senator from Arkansas will yield for just one moment, I will tell him what effect it would have on my mind.

Mr. ROBINSON. All right; I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. BURKE. Before the reading of the message of the President to this body was concluded, I knew what my position in the matter was—one of undying opposition to the proposal—and it does not require any letter from a "brother in Christ" or anyone else to show me the error in the proposal.

I should like, however, to ask the Senator from Arkansas just one question. Does he consider the propaganda to which he has just referred any more dangerous to the free expression of opinion in this country, or to the ability of Senators and Representatives to make up their own minds, than the announced radio address of the Works Progress Administrator tonight on the other side of the question, appealing to the thousands upon thousands of W. P. A. workers over the country? What about that kind of propaganda?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska has asked me what I think about the speech of the Works Progress Administrator to be delivered tonight. I do not know what he is going to say and therefore must ask to be excused from expressing an opinion on the merits of the speech.

Mr. BURKE. If the Senator——

Mr. ROBINSON. Hold on just a minute. This is my time.

Mr. BURKE. It is.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think the Works Progress Administrator has the right to speak on the subject. Does the Senator from Nebraska think he has no right to speak on the subject?

Mr. BURKE. I think he has a perfect right to speak on it, and I think the gentleman, whoever he was, who wrote that letter had a perfect right to send the letter to the senior Senator from Nebraska or anyone else to whom he wished to send it; and to intimate that there is anything unfair about it seems to me altogether without foundation.

Mr. ROBINSON. At last the Senator from Nebraska has answered the question I asked him. He had previously gone afield and talked about various subjects, but finally he comes to the issue. I asked him, and I asked other Senators, whether they think that is fair and honest propaganda; and I construe the Senator's answer to mean that he does regard it as fair and honest propaganda.

Mr. BURKE. I do not approve of some of the expressions used in the letter; but if that is what the gentleman had in his mind, I think he has a perfect right to express it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, he has expressed it. I am not questioning his power to say anything he pleases. I am pointing out the fact that it is dishonest and unfair propaganda.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE] has answered both ways, according to my interpretation of his answer. He first implied that the statement was a fair one, but now he says he does not approve of the statements embraced in the letter. Of course, we shall go forward debating this question, and, of course, from time to time differing views will be expressed in regard to it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the senior Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to clear in my own mind the connection that Mr. Mahn has with this letter. I happen to be very well acquainted with the gentleman. The Senator says the letter comes in his envelope. I assume that the letter was sent by Mr. Mahn to the Senator from Arkansas, and perhaps to other Senators, simply for their information.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; that is the point in my calling the attention of the Senate to the fact that while the letter comes from Wichita, Kans., under date of February 12, and is signed by Gerald B. Winrod, it is mailed to me—not to the senior Senator from Nebraska, but mailed to "Hon. JOSEPH T. ROBINSON, United States Senator, Washington, D. C.", in an envelope bearing the following marking:

"After 5 days return to Theo. Mahn, Alma, Nebr."

What it shows is that Mahn is permitting to be sent out, in his envelopes, this scurrilous and unfair propaganda.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, that is what I wanted to bring out.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is it that the Senator wants to bring out?

Mr. NORRIS. I know nothing whatever about it; but my idea is that Mr. Mahn has sent that letter to the Senator from Arkansas in order that the Senator may know the propaganda that is going on.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, perhaps the Senator is right; and if he is, I owe an apology to Mr. Mahn.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator does.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.
